Notwithstanding the direct order for the production of the libel in this case, none has been produced; nor has the slightest reason been given to account for its non-production. The general usage of maritime nations, to proceed in prize causes to adjudication in this manner, either by a formal libel, or by some equivalent proceeding, is so notorious that the omission of it is not to be presumed on the part of any civilized government which professes to proceed upon the principles of international law. How, then, are we to account for the omission in this case? If, by the course of proceedings in Venezuela, a libel does not constitute any part of the acts of its courts, that could *be easily shown. The neglect [*170 to show this, or in any manner to account for the non-production of the libel, if it exists, cannot but give rise to unfavorable suspicions as to the whole transaction. And where an order for farther proof is made, and the party disobeys its injunctions, or neglects to comply with them, courts of prize are in the habit of considering such negligence as contumacy, leading to presumptions fatal to his claim. We think, in this case, that the non-production of the libel, under the circumstances, would justify the rejection of the claim of Francesche.

Upon the other point, as to the proprietary interest of Francesche under the asserted sale, there is certainly very positive testimony of witnesses to the reality of the sale to him, and to his ability to make the purchase. And if this testimony stood alone, although it is certainly not, in all respects, consistent or harmonious, no difficulty would be felt in allowing it entire judicial credence. But it is encountered by very strong circumstances on the other side; and circumstances will sometimes outweigh the most positive testimony. It is remarkable, that from the institution of this cause up to the present time, a period of nearly four years, Francesche has not, by any personal act, made himself a party to the cause. He has never made any affidavit of proprietary interest; he has never produced any document verified by his testimony; he has never recognized the claim made in his behalf; he has never, as far as we have any knowledge, advanced any money for the defense of it. Yet the brig is admitted 171*] *to have been a valuable vessel, and was purchased, as is asserted, for the large sum of thirty thousand dollars. Upon an order of farther proof, it is the usual, and almost invariable practice, for the claimant to make proofs, on his own oath, of his proprietary interest, and to give explanations of the nature, origin and character of his rights, and of the difficulties which surround them. This it is so much the habit of courts of prize to expect, that the very absence of such proofs always leads to considerable doubts. How are we to account for such utter indifference and negligence on the part of Francesche, as to the fate of so valuable a property? Is it consistent with the ordinary prudence which every man applies to the preservation of his own interest? Can it be rationally explained, but upon the supposition that his interest in this suit is nominal and not real.

This is not all. Immediately after the ostensible sale to Francesche, the Nereyda was put in command of Childs, an American citizen, who was an utter stranger to him, as far as we have any means of knowledge, and sailed for Baltimore, the home port of the Irresistible, and the domicile of Daniels and Childs. There is no evidence that she has ever revisited Margarita, and there is positive evidence that she has, for the three last years, been in habits of intimacy with the ports of the United States. Where are the owner's instructions, given to the master on his departure for Baltimore? Where is the documentary evidence of Francesche's ownership? Where are the proofs of his disbursements 172*] for the vessel *during her subsequent voyages? From the time of her voyage to Baltimore, she has remained under the management of Daniels, or Childs, or some other apparent agent of Daniels. She has undergone extensive repairs, her rig has been altered, heavy expenses have been incurred, and a new master has been appointed to her. Under whose authority have all these acts been done? Where are the orders of Francesche for these acts? Daniels has constantly been connected with the vessel; he has superintended her repairs; he or his agents have paid the bills; he is the reputed owner of the vessel; and he has been consulted as to the material operations. How can all these things be, and yet the real owner be a foreigner, a Venezuelan? How can he be presumed to lay by, without any apparent interposition in the destiny of his own vessel?

There are some other extraordinary circumstances in the case. The Nereyda arrived at Margarita under the command of Childs as prize-master; and in a few days afterwards, Daniels arrived there with the Irresistible. The crew of the latter vessel run away with her; and Daniels then sailed in the Nereyda, in pursuit of the privateer, and of course on a voyage for his own peculiar benefit. How is this reconcilable with the supposition of a real sale to Francesche? What interest had the latter in regaining the Irresistible, or subduing a revolted crew? Why should his vessel, after that object was accomplished, have gone to Baltimore? Why should he intrust to strangers, Wheat. 8.

for a voyage in which he had no apparent interest, *so valuable a property? If he [173 made any contract for that voyage, why is not that contract produced? These are questions which it seems very difficult to answer in any manner useful to the asserted proprietary interest of Francesche. Yet the facts, to which allusion is here made, are drawn from the farther proof of the claimant; and this farther proof, it is not immaterial to observe, comes not from Margarita, where Francesche resided—and for aught that appears, still resides—but from La Guayra, with which he is not shown to have any immediate connection.

Looking, therefore, to all the circumstances of the case, the fact of the unchanged possession of the captors, the habits of the vessel, the apparent control of the property by Daniels, the utter absence of all proper documentary proofs of ownership, instructions, disbursements, and even connection with her on the part of the claimant, we think that there is the strongest reasons to believe that no real sale ever took place, and that the property remains still in the original captors, unaffected by the asserted transfer. The positive evidence is completely borne down by the strong and irresistible current of circumstantial evidence which opposes it.

Upon both grounds, therefore, viz., the omission to produce the original libel, or account for its non-production, and the insufficiency of the proofs of proprietary interest, the court are of opinion that the cause must be decided against the asserted claim.

If this be so, then, as it is clear that the original *outfit of the privateer Irresistible [174 was illegal, upon the principles already established by this court, the property of the Nereyda remains in His Majesty the King of Spain, and ought to be restored accordingly. The decree of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, and the Nereyda is ordered to be restored to the libellant, with costs of suit.

Decree reversed.

[CHANCERY. LETTER OF ATTORNEY.]

HUNT v. ROUSMANIER'S ADM'RS.

A letter of attorney may, in general, be revoked by the party making it, and is revoked by his death.

Where it forms a part of a contract, and is a security for the performance of any act, it is usually made irrevocable in terms, or if not so made, is deemed irrevocable in law.

But a power of attorney, though irrevocable during the life of the party, becomes (at law) extinct by his death.

But if the power be coupled with an interest, it survives the person giving it, and may be executed after his death.

To constitute a power coupled with an interest,

NOTE.—Power of attorney, revocation of.

A power of attorney becomes invalid by the death of the principal, except so far as the attorney has an interest coupled with the power. Boone v. Clark, 3 Cranch, C. C. 389.

Such power is also suspended by the insanity of there must be an interest in the thing itself, and not merely in the execution of the power.

How far a court of equity will compel the specific execution of a contract, intended to be secured by an irrevocable power of attorney, which was revoked by operation of law on the death of the party.

The general rule, both at law and in equity, is, that parol testimony is not admissible to vary a written instrument.

But, in cases of fraud and mistake, courts of equity will relieve.

It seems that a court of equity will relieve in a case of mistake of law merely.

175*] * APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Rhode Island.

The original bill, filed by the appellant, Hunt, stated that Lewis Rousmanier, the intestate of the defendants, applied to the plaintiff in January, 1820, for the loan of $1,450, offering to give, in addition to his notes, a bill of sale, or a mortgage of his interest in the brig Nereus, then at sea, as collateral security for the re-payment of the money. The sum requested was lent; and on the 11th of January, the said Rousmanier executed two notes for the amount; and on the 15th of the same month, he executed a power of attorney, authorizing the plaintiff to make and execute a bill of sale of three-fourths of the said vessel to himself, or to any other person; and in the event of the said vessel, or her freight, being lost, to collect the money which should become due on a policy by which the vessel and freight were insured. This instrument contained, also, a proviso, reciting that the power was given for collateral security for the payment of the notes already mentioned, and was to be void on their payment; on the failure to do which, the plaintiff was to pay the amount thereof, and all expenses, out of the proceeds of the said property, and to return the residue to the said Rousmanier.

The bill further stated that on the 21st of March, 1820, the plaintiff lent to the said Rousmanier the additional sum of $700, taking his note for payment, and a similar power to dispose of his interest in the schooner Industry, then also at sea. The bill then charged that on the 6th of May, 1820, the said Rousmanier died insolvent, having paid only $200 on the said notes. The plaintiff gave notice of his claim; and, on the return of the Nereus and Industry, took possession of them, and offered the intestate's interest in them for sale. The defendants forbade the sale; and this bill was brought to compel them to join in it.

The defendants demurred generally, and the court sustained the demurrer, but gave the plaintiff leave to amend his bill.

The amended bill stated that it was expressly agreed between the parties, that Rousmanier was to give specific security on the Nereus and Industry, and that he offered to execute a mortgage on them. That counsel was consulted on the subject, who advised that a power of attorney, such as was actually executed, should be taken in preference to a mortgage, because it was equally valid and effectual as a security, and would prevent the necessity of changing the papers of the vessels, or of taking possession of them on their arrival in port. The powers were, accordingly, executed, with the full belief that they would, and with the intention that they should, give the plaintiff as full and perfect security as would be given by a deed of mortgage. The bill prayed that the defendants might be decreed to join in a sale of the interest of their intestate in the Nereus and Industry, or to sell the same themselves, and pay out of the proceeds the debt due to the plaintiff. To this amended bill, also, the defendants demurred, and on argument the demurrer was sustained, and the bill dismissed. From this decree the plaintiff appealed to this court.

The cause was argued at the last term.

Mr. Wheaton, for the appellant, stated that the question in this case was, whether, under the agreement mentioned in the original and the principal. Bunce v. Gallagher, 5 Blatch. 481; 7 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 32.

A revocation may be, by operation of law, by the death either of the principal or of the agent. Littletton, s. 66; Co. Litt. 52; Shipman v. Thompson, Willes, 104, 105; Wynne v. Thomas, Willes, 563; Wallace v. Cook, 5 Esp. 117; Smout v. Ilberry, 10 Mees. & W. 1; Blades v. Free, 9 Barn. & C. 167; Galt v. Galloway, 4 Pet. 332; Aertson v. Cagg, 2 Humph. Irving, 28 Cal. 645; Watt v. Watt, 2 Barb. Ch. 371; Culver v. West. Un. Tel. Co., 60 N. Y. 691.

It will make no difference if the power is declared in express terms to be irrevocable; for if it be not coupled with an interest, although irrevocable by the party, it is revoked by his death. Lepard v. Vernon, 2 Ves. & Beam. 51; Watson v. King, 4 Camp. 272; 1 Starkie R. 121; Houston v. Robertson, 6 Taunt. 448; Story on Agency, see. 488.

But where an authority or power is coupled with an interest, or where it is given for a valuable consideration, or where it is part of a security, then, unless there is an express stipulation that it shall be revocable, it is, from its own nature and character, in contemplation of law, irrevocable, whether it is expressed to be so on the face of the instrument conferring the authority or not. Smart v. Sanders, 5 Man., Gr., & Scott. C. B. 895; Knapp v. Alvord, 10 Paige. 205; Marfield v. Douglass, 1 Sand. N. Y. 360; *Smith on Mere. Upon the question whether equity will relieve against a mistake of law, it is said in Wheaton v. Wheaton, 9 Conn. 101, that it would not perhaps be going too far to say that the doctrines laid down by Ch. J. Marshall in this case (8 Wheat. 174) were greatly shaken by the subsequent opinion of Judge Washington (1 Pet. 3); and taking the whole case together, it will hardly warrant a departure from principles so long considered as settled.

The later decision (1 Pet. 1) is explained and followed in Oliver v. Mut. Ins. Co., 2 Curt., C. C. 277, 209; Bank of U. S. v. Daniel, 12 Pet. 32. In the last named case (12 Pet.), at pages 55, 56, it is said "That mere mistakes of law are not remediable is well established, as was declared in Hunt v. Rousmanier, 1 Pet. 15; and we can only repeat what was there said: 'That whatever exceptions there are to the rule, they will be found few in number, and to have something peculiar in their character,' and to involve other elements of decision." Bk. of U. S. v. Daniel, 12 Pet. 32, 55, 56.

amended bill, by which the plaintiff was to have a specific security on certain vessels belonging to the defendants' intestate, for the repayment of a loan of money made to him in his life-time by the plaintiff, a court of equity will compel the defendants to give effect to that security, by joining in a sale of the vessels, or in any other manner.

That the original intention and contract of the parties was to create a permanent collateral security on the vessels, in the nature of, or equivalent to, a mortgage, is explicitly averred in the bill, and, of course, admitted by the demurrer. But it is supposed by the court below that they have failed to give effect to this their intention and contract, not from any mistake of fact, or accident, but from a mistake of law, in taking a letter of attorney with an irrevocable power to sell, instead of an absolute or conditional bill of sale. It is said that this power, though irrevocable during the life-time of the intestate, was revoked on his death by operation of law, not being a power coupled with an interest in the thing itself, but only coupled with an interest in the execution of the power, which is supposed to expire with the death of the party creating it, in the same manner as a mere 178* naked *power; and it is therefore concluded that this is not a case where a court of equity will relieve.

1. But it is conceived that this conclusion proceeds upon the idea that the original contract between the parties was entirely merged and extinguished in the execution of the instruments which were executed, and which, by the accident of the death of one party, have turned out to be insufficient in point of law to give effect to that contract. Here was no mistake of law in the formation of the original contract. The law was fully understood in respect to all the facts on which the contract was founded. The loan, and the terms on which it was granted, were lawful; the intestate was the owner of the vessels, and legally competent to hypothecate them for his just debts; he did actually contract to give the plaintiff a specific, permanent lien upon them, as collateral security for the payment of the notes. The mistake is not in the facts, nor the law, nor in the contract, but in the remedy upon the contract. It was not necessary that the contract should be reduced to writing at all, or evidenced by any written instrument, for it is not within the statute of frauds, like an agreement for the sale of lands, &c. There was a complete legal contract, but, by the mistake of the parties, the mode selected for its execution is defective at law. This contract still subsists in full force, and is not extinguished and discharged by the writings, which have turned out to be inadequate means of giving effect to it. The contract was not for a power to sell, but for a specific security; not 179* for a pledge of the property *which was to expire on the death of the party, but for a permanent lien upon it. It is an unquestionable rule of law, that all previous negotiations are extinguished and discharged by the contract itself; but the legal and just import of this rule is, that where the parties have definitively concluded a contract, all previous terms, propositions and negotiations concerning it, are merged in the contract itself; and this is equally true, whether the contract is in writing, or by parol only. It does not, therefore, follow that the contract is extinguished, but the contrary. The contract clearly exists, and is supposed by all the authorities to exist; but is not to be affected by the negotiations of the parties which preceded its final completion.

The contract, in this case, is not merged and extinguished in the writing; the power looks to something future to be done by virtue of it, and pursuant to the contract; the power is not the contract; it is a means by which a future act was to have been done, in fulfillment of the contract by one of the parties. It cannot be pretended that the parties meant that the power should embrace the whole contract between them on both sides; neither does it. The agreement is not, and was not intended to be set out. The loan, the terms on which it was made, the negotiable notes, the assignment of the policy, all exist, independently of the power, and are binding engagements. The power was intended as a means in the hands of the plaintiff to coerce the intestate to the performance of his agreement; it was not *intended as evidence [*180 at all, and, at most, it is evidence of part of the contract only; of the means which the parties had selected to carry into effect the contract, but which does not preclude a resort to other means, that having failed by accident. It cannot be denied that, according to the whole current of authorities, parol evidence is admissible to correct errors and mistakes in the written instrument. But how can this be reconciled with the notion that the parol contract is extinguished by the writing? For, if the writing alone is the contract, all idea of mistake is utterly and necessarily excluded. The writing, in that case, would be the original, and to admit parol proof, would be, not to correct, but to alter the original. And perhaps it may be well doubted whether the power, in this case, can be considered as legal direct, written evidence of any part of the contract. If A sells his ship to B, and gives him a power of attorney to take possession of her, it can hardly be considered that this power is the direct, written evidence of the contract; it is a power growing out of the contract, and given to aid its execution. The undisputed execution of the instrument by which the power was given is evidence of its being a voluntary act, and, by inference, proves that it was agreed to be given, but is not the direct evidence of the contract itself. There is an essential difference between a contract to perform a particular thing, and the actual performance of that thing. Here the contract was for a specific lien on the vessels, and to secure that lien the power was given; it is evidence of an after *act intended to be done under [*181 the contract, rather than direct evidence of the contract itself.

It must be admitted that there was originally a contract for a lien, by mortgage, bill of sale, or some other mode; nor can it be successfully contended that the power of attorney, when adopted, operated either as an extinguishment of the original contract, or as a waiver of all other security; thus narrowing down that instrument, the original contract for a lien, in the same manner, and with like legal effect, as if the original contract was for that identical instrument and nothing more. The contract was for a legal and valid security on the vessels; and the parties, by adopting the power, did not change, nor mean to change, the contract, but to execute it in part. It was a mode, and the parties believed, a good and sufficient mode of securing the lien, pursuant to the contract. It has now proved insufficient of itself. The contract, however, remains the same as at first, a contract for security, and wholly unexecuted; and if the particular instrument adopted by the parties to carry it into effect, proves insufficient for that purpose, it clearly entitles the injured party to the interposition of a court of equity.

2. It cannot be denied that, in some cases, mistakes in a written instrument may be corrected by parol evidence. But it is said by the court below that this is not one of those cases; that here is no mistake of fact; that the power contains the very language and terms the parties intended it should contain, and that 182*] to grant relief in such a case, *would be in opposition to the whole current of authorities.

But it is submitted that such is not the rule upon this subject. It would seem to be an inference, from the decision of the Circuit Court, that no relief can be granted unless something is omitted which was expressly agreed to be inserted, or something inserted more than was agreed; that the errors to be corrected are such as have occurred in omissions or additions in drawing up the written instrument, but not the errors in its legal import and effect; that if the formal instrument, and the language, are used, which the parties intended should be used, no relief can be had, although that instrument does not contain the legal intentions of the parties. But it is humbly conceived that the distinction, as here applied, is not supported by the authorities. If too much is inserted, or something is omitted in the written instrument, it may be corrected by parol evidence, because it does not contain the meaning and intention of the parties. And if every word, and no more, is inserted, which the parties designed to have inserted, yet, if those words do not embrace and import the meaning and intention of the parties, it is as clear a mistake and misconception as the other, and the contract is as effectually defeated by the mistake in the one instance as the other. The true foundation for the admission of parol evidence is, that the instrument does not speak the legal, though it may the verbal, language of the parties; it does not speak the legal import of their contract as 183*] they intended it should. And *wherever the intention of the parties will be defeated by a defect in the instrument, that defect may be proved and corrected by parol evidence, whether it arises from omission or addition, or from insufficient and inapt language and terms of the instrument. When it is satisfactorily proved by parol, that there is a mistake in the instrument as to its provisions, or a misconception of its legal import and effect, so that the intentions of the parties will, in either instance, be defeated, it is clearly a case of equitable cognizance and a subject of equitable jurisdiction and relief.<sup>1</sup>

3. Again, the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of his lien, upon the ground that the contract has been, on his part, fully performed; and even if no writing whatever had been executed, he would be entitled to the performance of it by the other party. Part performance has always been considered as obviating the necessity of written evidence, and gives to the performing party the benefit of specific relief against his negligent and faithless adversary. It has, indeed, been questioned in several cases (arising under the statute of frauds, and touching an interest in lands), whether the payment of a small part of the consideration money would take the case out of the statute, as amounting to part performance. But in all, or *nearly all these cases, the payment [*184 was of what is called earnest money, to bind the bargain, and not in the nature of a substantial, beneficial payment of part of the consideration money. But even if it be a principle, that part payment does not exempt the case from the provisions of the statute; yet it is conceived that the rule does not extend to a case where the contract stated in the bill is distinctly admitted, and where the full consideration has actually been advanced and paid. Wherever the party has completely and fully executed his part of the contract, whether by payment of money or other acts, the rule in equity is, I apprehend, almost universal, to coerce the other party to a specific execution of the contract on his part.<sup>2</sup>

As to the cases which are supposed to lay down a general and inflexible rule, that a mistake of parties as to the law, is not a ground for reforming the instrument, they will all be found to resolve themselves into cases where there was no other, or previous agreement, than what was contained, or meant to be contained, in the instrument itself. Thus, in a leading case on this subject,<sup>3</sup> where an annuity was granted, but no power of redemption contained in the deed, it being erroneously supposed by the parties that it would make the contract usurious, Lord Thurlow refused to *relieve. But here the whole contract [*185 was unquestionably merged in the deed, and therefore the Lord Chancellor refused to add a new term to the agreement, upon the ground that it was intentionally omitted by the parties, upon a mistake of the law. But in the case now before the court, there was no intentional omission in the instrument, upon a mistake of law or fact, for the instrument was never meant by the parties to contain the terms of the contract. It was merely intended as an instrument, or means, to carry the contract into effect, and I have already endeavored to show that the contract might well subsist, and be carried into effect without it. Not so with the grant of the annuity in Lord Irnham v. Child.

But there are many cases in the books where the party has been relieved from the consequence of acts founded on ignorance of the law,<sup>1</sup> and I am unable to reconcile these cases with the idea that there is any universal rule on this subject, still less that it can be applied to the present case.

4. Lastly, the power was unquestionably intended by the parties to be irrevocable forever, and to transfer an interest in the thing itself, or the authority of disposing of it for the benefit of the plaintiff; and even admitting, argumenti gratia, that this intention has failed at law, by the death of the party, still it is insisted [*186*] ed that a *court of equity will now compel the personal representatives to do what it would have compelled their intestate to do, if the intention had been defeated by any other accident during his life-time. It was an equitable lien, or mortgage; and such a lien will be enforced in equity against the claims of all other creditors, although imperfect at law.<sup>2</sup> So, too, an agreement for a mortgage, and an advance of money thereon, binds the heir and creditors.<sup>3</sup> And a deposit of title deeds, even a part of the title papers, upon an advance of money, without a word passing, creates an equitable mortgage.<sup>4</sup> A fortiori, ought an express agreement for a lien to be specially enforced in equity? The power is a power coupled with an interest, not merely in the execution of the power, but in the thing itself, at least in the view of a court of equity; and the only reason why it is not effectual at law to secure the specific lien stipulated, is on account of its being made in the form of a letter of attorney, authorizing the plaintiff to sell in the name of the grantor. Even admitting that such a power cannot be executed, qua power after the death of the grantor, still, the instrument containing the power recites that it was given as collateral security for the payment of the notes; and in case of loss of the vessel, or freight, authorizes the plaintiff to receive the amount to become [*187*] due on the policy of insurance *on the same, which was also assigned. Here, then, is an equitable lien or mortgage, and equity will now compel the administrators to put the party in the same situation as if such lien or mortgage had been perfected.<sup>5</sup>

Mr. Hunter, for the respondents, stated that the first question was, whether the letters of attorney were powers coupled with an interest, or only personal authorities, which expired with the intestate.

This question was fully investigated by the learned judge in the court below, and determined in favor of the defendants. "In his judgment, these were not powers coupled with an interest, in the sense of the law. They were naked powers, and, as such, by their own terms, could be executed only in the name of Rousmanier, and, therefore, became extinct by his death." This question, arising on the original bill, seems now to be abandoned by the plaintiff's counsel, and it is therefore unnecessary to argue it anew. The court will be in possession of the able opinion referred to; it exhausts the subject, and it would be useless to repeat, and presumptuous to add to, or vary its arguments. A single authority, however, may be added, on account of the coincidence of the facts in the case, to that now under discussion.

"One being indebted to B, makes a letter of attorney to him to receive all such wages as shall *after become due to him, then [*188 goes to sea, and dies; this authority is determined, so that he cannot compel an account of wages, if any due at making the letter of attorney, much less of what after became due, but the administrator must pay according to the course of the law."<sup>6</sup>

2. As to the amended bill, it entirely disappoints the liberal intentions of the judge in granting it. He said that courts of equity would relieve where the instruments have been imperfectly drawn up by mistake, or where, by accident, the parties have failed in executing their agreements.

The amended bill refers neither to accident nor mistake, or to any facts tending to prove their existence. It excludes and negatives the supposition of accident or mistake. The whole matter (it appears) was done upon advice, with the assistance of counsel learned in the law. The security which the plaintiff ultimately received was that which he preferred. He could, at the time, have taken that kind of security he seems now to desire. He rejected the offer of a mortgage, or bill of sale, and elected to take these powers of attorney. They were the most convenient for both parties, and so far was either party from being surprised or mistaken, that what was done appears as the judicious result of mutual and advised deliberations. Neither party had reference to the death of the other; it may be admitted that it was the death of Rousmanier which frustrated Hunt's expectation of indemnity; but where *an event [*189 happens without default on the other side, although expectation may be frustrated, and that expectation grounded, too, on the true intent of the parties, yet equity will not give relief.<sup>7</sup> The case presents no mistake or misconception. Fraud is not suggested; and it is admitted, there is no mistake either of omission or addition. It is clear, that the parties intended not an ordinary sale, or assignment of the vessels in question; yet the plaintiff seeks to have the same effect produced by his powers of attorney, as if they were grand bills of sale, or mortgages.

In the cases that have arisen upon the redeemability of annuities, where the parties, by mutual and innocent error, left out of the deed a provision for redemption, under an idea that, if inserted, it would make the transaction usurious, there being no charge of fraud in the omission, the court would not grant relief. They could see no mistake. Lord Eldon says, the court were desired to do, not what the parties intended, but something contrary thereto. They desired to be put in the same situation as if they had been better informed, and had a contrary intention. It is admitted that the plaintiff's security was to be by powers of attorney; and why should the court now turn them into bills of sale, or mortgages, or any security equivalent to these, but different from those originally and deliberately taken.<sup>1</sup>

190*] *It was the fault of the plaintiff that he waived taking a mortgage or a bill of sale; and no maxim of equity is better established than this, "that no man is entitled to the aid of a court of equity, when the necessity of resorting to that court is created by his own fault."<sup>2</sup>

It seems to be admitted that there was no mistake in point of fact; it is, in substance, urged that there was a mistake in point of law; both parties, assisted by counsel, were mistaken in supposing a defeasible to be an indefeasible security; that powers of attorney, deriving their sole force from the life of the constituent, were perpetually obligatory, though death, and the law decreed, otherwise. No case is cited which has gone the length of deciding that a transaction taintless of fraud, undisturbed by accident, and unaffected by mistake in fact, has been rescinded and reversed because the parties innocently misconceive the law.

All the cases are of a contrary tendency. Every party stands upon his own case, and his counsel's "wit." In the case of Pullen v. Ready,<sup>3</sup> Lord Hardwicke, in substance says: If parties act with counsel, the parties shall be supposed to be acquainted with the consequences of law, and nothing is more mischievous than to decree relief for an alleged mistake, in a matter in which, if there was any mistake, it was that of all the parties, and no one of them is more under an imposition than the other. Every man, 191*] says Mr. Chancellor Kent, *must be charged at his peril with the knowledge of the law; there is no other principle that is safe or practicable in the common intercourse of mankind. Courts do not undertake to relieve parties from their acts and deeds fairly done, on a full knowledge of facts, though under a mistake of the law.<sup>4</sup> I never understood, says Lord Eldon,<sup>5</sup> that though this court, upon ground of a mistake (in point of fact), would reform an instrument, that, therefore, it would hold that the instrument has a different aspect from that which belongs to it at law. Lord Thurlow, long before, refused to add a new term to an agreement, upon the ground that it was intentionally omitted upon a mistake of the law.<sup>6</sup> And the master of the rolls subsequently adhered to this doctrine.<sup>7</sup> It was substantially upon this view of the case that the learned judge in the court below decided that the demurrer to the amended bill was well taken. "He could perceive no ground for the interference of a court of equity. There was no mistake in the execution of the instruments; they expressed exactly what the parties intended they should express; this security was the choice of the plaintiff; in the event it has turned out unproductive; but this is his misfortune, and affords no ground to give him a preference over other creditors." As a creditor, he obtains his share, *legal payment of his note. [*192 The administrators, as trustees for all the creditors, are bound to exert themselves to prevent a priority which they believe to be unsanctioned by law. They contend for equality, they act on the defensive; they are solicitous to avoid an evil; they have no hope of receiving a gain; and they who are so placed (de damno evitando certantes), may take advantage, if it may be so called, of the error of another. This, says Lord Kaimes, is a universal law of nature, and is especially applicable as to creditors.<sup>7</sup>

The reasoning of the counsel for the appellant has no reference to the facts of the case. It strips the case of all its facts and circumstances, and goes upon the general intention of the deceased intestate to give his creditor a permanent and specific security. This general intention was consummated and ascertained by a particular and detailed execution, in the very mode which the creditor preferred.

The powers of attorney are now regarded by the plaintiff's counsel as non-existent. To give motion and progress to their argument, they would remove this obstruction; and to do this, they are obliged to attempt (merely human as they are) that which the schoolmen long ago (without impiety) said was impossible even with Deity: Quod factum est Deus ipse non potest revocare. But, at first, the powers of attorney were resorted to, and set up as charging the defendants, and that upon their own strength and validity, without the *suggestion of [*193 mistake or insufficiency; they were the foundation of the original bill.

Having chosen to begin his pursuit on the writing exclusively, and in perfect confidence of its validity, is it competent to the plaintiff, by an amendment to his bill, to resort to verbal negotiations merely introductory of the final settlement and consummate act between the parties, in which all negotiations were merged beyond the power of revival? The existence of the powers is at first not only asserted, but they are endowed with a continued existence beyond the life of their author. As this is found to be impossible, they are now to be considered as nothing; far from being a specific performance of the general intention, they are not the contract, nor any evidence of it. They are overthrown, for the purpose of erecting upon their overthrow a firmer fabric of obligation out of loose equities and verbal negotiations. There seems, in this course, to be too much inconsistency for sound and safe reasoning. Administrators must, necessarily, be ignorant of the private verbal communications of the parties, and they are left defenseless, and liable to impositions which cannot be detected nor repelled. The case of Haynes v. Hare, determined by Lord Loughborough,<sup>8</sup> is, as to many of its facts, and all its points of law, similar to the one now under consideration. The court then said, there is nothing so dangerous as to permit deeds and conveyances, after the death of the parties to them, to be liable *to have [*194 new terms added to them on the disclosure of an attorney, in a matter in which he could meet with no contradiction.<sup>1</sup>

3. Even if we could suppose the existence of a mistake, yet a review of all the leading cases would not furnish one, in any degree analogous to the present, in which relief has been granted. In the case of Graves v. the Boston Marine Insurance Company, the plaintiffs, in the bill, grounded themselves on the allegation, that their case was but the common one of a mistake in using inapt words to express the meaning of the parties.<sup>2</sup> The proofs as to the intention of one of the parties, was perfectly satisfactory, and as to the other, it pressed so heavily on the court, that they acknowledged there were doubts and difficulties in the case. But they decided against relief; they shrunk from the peril of conforming a written instrument to the alleged intention of the party plaintiff, upon a claim not asserted until an event made it his interest so to do. In a case between the original parties, unaffected by death or insolvency, where no new and third party sought mere equality of condition, the court appeared to have acted upon the principle that they had before them a written instrument, not in itself doubtful, and they repelled the recourse to parol testimony, or extraneous circumstances, to create a doubt where the instrument itself was clear and *explicit.<sup>3</sup> The doctrine of the cases under the statute of frauds, applies a fortiori, for, by the common law, an attorney must be made by deed.<sup>4</sup>

4. But again, admitting, argumenti gratia, the existence of a mistake, can a plaintiff claim on that account relief, admitting that a defendant could. A defendant, in a proper case, is privileged to show a mistake as matter of defense, and for the purpose of rebutting the plaintiff's equity; but no English case can be shown, where the plaintiff has been allowed to give parol evidence varying a written instrument on the ground of mistake.<sup>5</sup> These cases, of the highest authority, and determined on great consideration, show the difference of right and condition as to plaintiff and defendant, of evidence offered for the different purpose of resisting a decree, and that offered for obtaining it. The difference exists in the code of every civilized nation. Favorabiliores rei potius quam actores habentur, is the maxim of the civil law. Potior est conditio defendentis, is the familiar language of our own. These, and other similar maxims, are of universal prevalence, and uncontradicted reception, and equally applicable in concerns civil and criminal. Both parties are the object of equal protection; but to make that *protection equal, a certain position and condition is assigned to the defendant; he is so placed that he may not be overcome by surprise; the law seeks for actual, not nominal reciprocity; the relative condition of the parties enters into the account; even-handed justice first corrects the balance, by making the proper allowances before she weighs the merits of the cause. Looking to the statute of frauds, or to the pre-existing rule of the common rule (a fortiori, applicable in the instance of a power of attorney, which cannot be but with deed), we must conclude that, in a case like this, the defendants are not to be charged, unless they have agreed to be so by writing; and if there is a writing, it excludes a reference to what may have been the previous talk or negotiation, the original proposition, or the rejected offer. There is a writing or deed which does not charge the present defendants, and there the case ought to end. It is not necessary to invoke the aid of arguments drawn from public policy, or to exhibit the sad inconveniences that would result from the plaintiff's success. The impolicy of permitting a transaction of the kind exhibited by the plaintiff's bill, is obvious. It is contrary to what ought to be the openness of commercial dealing, and to the entire spirit of the commercial laws. That requires publicity in transfers of property, demands that possession should accompany the grant, permits the control of the possessor to prove the ownership, and avoids or limits secret trusts and liens; secret letters of attorney, granting a power to sell, especially in the case of ships, *without delivery, without a change of [*197 papers, without notice to the government or to the mercantile public, are fraught with dangerous consequences, and could hardly be supported as against creditors, though the life of the constituent still sustained their existence and efficacy. Upon the whole, it is submitted that it is the aim of the plaintiff's counsel unduly to amplify equitable jurisdiction, and to extend an unwarrantable relief, upon the ground of mistake, in a case where no mistake exists, and where, even if it did, his right or faculty of availing himself of it is denied. "Optima est lex qua minimum reliquit arbitrio Judicis; Optimus Juxta qui minimum sibi."

Mr. Wheaton, for the appellant, in reply, first remarked that the whole of the argument submitted by the counsel for the respondents, proceeded upon a mistaken assumption that the entire contract between the parties was merged in the written power, and that this instrument is the only admissible evidence of the terms and conditions on which the loan was made. But the demurrer admits all the facts stated in the original and amended bill, as if the same were proved by parol testimony; all the terms and conditions of the contract were not intended to be reduced to writing by the parties, nor are they required by any positive law to be so expressed; and the power itself was merely incidental to the contract, and intended, like the transfer of the policy of insurance, as a means of carrying it into effect. It might as well be contended that the transfer of the policy was *the entire contract, as the letter of [*198 attorney embraced all its terms and conditions. The true question is, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, an equitable lien was created, which a court of chancery will carry into effect.

Nor was it meant to be admitted that this was not a power coupled with an interest, in the sense of the law. It was merely meant to insist, that even if that point were conceded, it formed no obstacle to the interference of a court of equity in the present case. But it is with very great deference submitted, that this is not a mere naked power, according to the definition given of it by Chief Justice (now Chancellor) Kent.<sup>1</sup> That learned and accurate lawyer says: "A power simply collateral, and without interest, or a naked power, is where, to a mere stranger, authority is given to dispose of an interest, in which he had not before, nor hath by the instrument creating the power, any estate whatever; but when a power is given to a person who derives, under the instrument creating the power, or otherwise, a present or future interest in the land, it is then a power relating to the land." In the text of Co. Litt. 1, 66, the deed of feoffment was made to one person, and a letter of attorney to deliver seizin to another, who was a mere stranger. But here the power is given by a debtor to his creditor, and is expressly declared to be given as a collateral security for the debt. And, in the case cited from Precedents in Chancery, 125, the power *did not purport, on the face of it, to be given as a collateral security, nor was there any evidence of a contract for a lien or security on the wages.

Nor do we proceed solely on the ground of a mere mistake, either in fact or law. We ask to have the contract executed in good faith by the personal representatives of the debtor, precisely as he would have been compelled to carry it into effect if its execution had been prevented by any other accident than that of his death. It is perfectly clear that both parties intended to create a specific lien; and the lien is supposed to be as valid now, as in the lifetime of the intestate; for it is submitted to be a well-established principle of equity (with very few exceptions, of which this case is not one), that when the party is holden to the specific execution of a contract, his personal representatives are equally holden. If the power is now defective in securing a lien, it was equally so in his life-time. No legal or equitable right is, in this respect, lost by his death.<sup>2</sup>

The respondent's counsel assumes it to be a settled doctrine of equity that a plaintiff is never permitted to show, by parol proof, that there has been a mistake or misapprehension in a written contract, the execution of which he seeks to enforce; and that the rule which permits the introduction of such proofs is exclusively confined to the defendant, against whom the contract is sought to be enforced. It is 200* true that Lord Redesdale, *in Clinan v. Cooke,<sup>3</sup> seems to be of that opinion; and in a few other cases, relief has been denied on that ground. But all these were cases arising under the statute of frauds, and nearly all of them respected an interest in lands; and in all such cases, parol proof, when offered to vary or materially affect a written contract, is certainly received with great circumspection and reserve. It is, however, submitted that the rule stated by the respondent's counsel is not founded in principle; and that parol evidence to show mistakes in written instruments is, in equity, equally open to both parties. And, it will be found that in almost all the cases where the plaintiff has failed in seeking the aid of parol proof, it was not because any such rule was interposed, but because his evidence of the supposed mistake was not clear and satisfactory. The case referred to in 2 Cranch, 419, is of this description. The court, in that case, would have afforded the plaintiff relief, if he had been able to prove the mistake which he alleged in the policy. The same principle is adopted in 2 Johns. Ch. Rep., 274, 630; and if there were any doubts growing out of some of the English decisions, they would be dissipated by the learned and able investigation of Mr. Chancellor Kent,<sup>4</sup> where all the authorities are carefully reviewed, and it is clearly established, that no distinction is made, in this respect, between the party plaintiff or defendant, but that the benefit of the rule is impartially extended to both.

*The cause was continued to the next [201 term for advisement.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court: The counsel for the appellant objects to the decree of the Circuit Court on two grounds. He contends,

1. That this power of attorney does, by its own operation, entitle the plaintiff, for the satisfaction of his debt, to the interest of Rousmanier in the Nereus and the Industry.

2. Or, if this be not so, that a court of chancery will, the conveyance being defective, lend its aid to carry the contract into execution, according to the intention of the parties.

We will consider, 1. The effect of the power of attorney.

This instrument contains no words of conveyance or of assignment, but is a simple power to sell and convey. As the power of one man to act for another depends on the will and license of that other, the power ceases when the will, or this permission, is withdrawn. The general rule, therefore, is, that a letter of attorney may, at any time, be revoked by the party who makes it; and is revoked by his death. But this general rule, which results from the nature of the act, has sustained some modification. Where a letter of attorney forms a part of a contract, and is a security for money, or for the performance of any act which is deemed valuable, it is generally made irrevocable in terms, or if not so, is deemed irrevocable in law.<sup>5</sup>

*Although a letter of attorney depends, [202 from its nature, on the will of the person making it, and may, in general, be recalled at his will, yet, if he binds himself for a consideration, in terms, or by the nature of his contract, not to change his will, the law will not permit him to change it. Rousmanier, therefore, could not, during his life, by any act of his own, have revoked this letter of attorney. But does it retain its efficacy after his death? We think it does not. We think it well settled, that a power of attorney, though irrevocable during the life of the party, becomes extinct by his death.

4.—2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 585.

5.—2 Esp. N. P. Rep. 565.

This principle is asserted in Littleton (see. 66.), by Lord Coke, in his commentary on that section (52 b.), and in Willes' Reports (105, note, and 565). The legal reason of the rule is a plain one. It seems founded on the presumption that the substitute acts by virtue of the authority of his principal, existing at the time the act is performed; and on the manner in which he must execute his authority, as stated in Coombes' case.<sup>1</sup> In that case it was resolved that "when any has authority as attorney to do any act, he ought to do it in his name who gave the authority." The reason of this resolution is obvious. The title can, regularly, pass out of the person in whom it is vested, only by a conveyance in his own name; and this cannot be executed by another for him, when it could not, in law, be 203*] executed by himself. A *conveyance in the name of a person who was dead at the time, would be a manifest absurdity.

This general doctrine, that a power must be executed in the name of a person who gives it, a doctrine founded on the nature of the transaction, is most usually engrafted in the power itself. Its usual language is, that the substitute shall do that which he is empowered to do in the name of his principal. He is put in the place and stead of his principal, and is to act in his name. This accustomed form is observed in the instrument under consideration. Hunt is constituted the attorney, and is authorized to make, and execute, a regular bill of sale in the name of Rousmanier. Now, as an authority must be pursued, in order to make the act of the substitute the act of the principal, it is necessary that this bill of sale should be in the name of Rousmanier; and it would be a gross absurdity that a deed should purport to be executed by him, even by attorney, after his death; for the attorney is in the place of the principal, capable of doing that alone which the principal might do.

This general rule, that a power ceases with the life of the person giving it, admits of one exception. If a power be coupled with an "interest," it survives the person giving it, and may be executed after his death.

As this proposition is laid down too positively in the books to be controverted, it becomes necessary to inquire what is meant by the expression, "a power coupled with an interest." Is it an interest in the subject on which the power 204*] is to be *exercised, or is it an interest in that which is produced by the exercise of the power? We hold it to be clear that the interest which can protect a power after the death of a person who creates it, must be an interest in the thing itself. In other words, the power must be engrafted on an estate in the thing.

The words themselves would seem to import this meaning. "A power coupled with an interest" is a power which accompanies, or is connected with, an interest. The power and the interest are united in the same person. But if we are to understand by the word "interest," an interest in that which is to be produced by the exercise of the power, then they are never united. The power, to produce the interest, must be exercised, and by its exercise, is extinguished. The power ceases when the interest commences, and, therefore, cannot, in accurate law language, be said to be "coupled" with it.

But the substantial basis of the opinion of the court on this point, is found in the legal reason of the principle. The interest or title in the thing being vested in the person who gives the power, remains in him, unless it be conveyed with the power, and can pass out of him only by a regular act in his own name. The act of the substitute, therefore, which, in such a case, is the act of the principal, to be legally effectual, must be in his name, must be such an act as the principal himself would be capable of performing, and which would be valid if performed by him. Such a power necessarily ceases with the life of *the person making it. 205 ing it. But if the interest, or estate, passes with the power, and vests in the person by whom the power is to be exercised, such person acts in his own name. The estate, being in him, passes from him by a conveyance in his own name. He is no longer a substitute, acting in the place and name of another, but is a principal acting in his own name, in pursuance of powers which limit his estate. The legal reason which limits power to the life of the person giving it, exists no longer, and the rule ceases with the reason on which it is founded. The intention of the instrument may be effected without violating any legal principle.

This idea may be in some degree illustrated by examples of cases in which the law is clear, and which are incompatible with any other exposition of the term "power coupled with an interest." If the word "interest," thus used, indicated a title to the proceeds of the sale, and not a title to the thing to be sold, then a power to A to sell for his own benefit, would be a power coupled with an interest; but a power to A to sell for the benefit of B, would be a naked power, which could be executed only in the life of the person who gave it. Yet, for this distinction, no legal reason can be assigned. Nor is there any reason for it in justice; for, a power to A, to sell for the benefit of B, may be as much a part of the contract on which B advances his money as if the power had been made to himself. If this were the true exposition of the term, then a power to A to sell for the use of B, inserted in a conveyance to A, of the thing *to be sold, would not be a 206 power coupled with an interest, and, consequently, could not be exercised after the death of the person making it; while a power to A to sell and pay a debt to himself, though not accompanied with any conveyance which might vest the title in him, would enable him to make the conveyance, and to pass a title not in him, even after the vivifying principle of the power had become extinct. But every day's experience teaches us that the law is not as the first case put would suppose. We know that a power to A to sell for the benefit of B, engrafted on an estate conveyed to A, may be exercised at any time, and is not affected by the death of the person who created it. It is, then, a power coupled with an interest, although the person to whom it is given has no interest in its exercise. His power is coupled with an interest in the thing which enables him to execute it in his own name, and is, therefore, not dependent on the life of the person who created it.

The general rule, that a power of attorney, though irrevocable by the party during his life, is extinguished by his death, is not affected by the circumstance that testamentary powers are executed after the death of the testator. The law, in allowing a testamentary disposition of property, not only permits a will to be considered as a conveyance, but gives it an operation which is not allowed to deeds which have their effect during the life of the person who executes them. An estate given by will may take effect at a future time or on a future contingency, 207* and, in the meantime, descends to the heir. The power is, necessarily, to be executed after the death of the person who makes it, and cannot exist during his life. It is the intention that it shall be executed after his death. The conveyance made by the person to whom it is given, takes effect by virtue of the will, and the purchaser holds his title under it. Every case of a power given in a will is considered in a court of chancery as a trust for the benefit of the person for whose use the power is made, and as a devise or bequest to that person.

It is, then, deemed perfectly clear that the power given in this case is a naked power, not coupled with an interest, which, though irrevocable by Rousmanier himself, expired on his death.

It remains to inquire, whether the appellant is entitled to the aid of this court, to give effect to the intention of the parties, to subject the interest of Rousmanier in the Nereus and Industry to the payment of the money advanced by the plaintiff on the credit of those vessels, the instrument taken for that purpose having totally failed to effect its object.

This is the point on which the plaintiff most relies, and is that on which the court has felt most doubt. That the parties intended, the one to give and the other to receive, an effective security on the two vessels mentioned in the bill, is admitted; and the question is, whether the law of this court will enable it to carry this intent into execution, when the instrument relied on by both parties has failed to accomplish its object.

The respondents insist that there is no defect 208* in the instrument itself; that it contains precisely what it was intended to contain, and is the instrument which was chosen by the parties deliberately, on the advice of counsel and intended to be the consummation of their agreement. That in such a case the written agreement cannot be varied by parol testimony.

The counsel for the appellant contends, with great force, that the cases in which parol testimony has been rejected, are cases in which the agreement itself has been committed to writing; and one of the parties has sought to contradict, explain, or vary it, by parol evidence. That in this case the agreement is not reduced to writing. The power of attorney does not profess to be the agreement, but is a collateral instrument to enable the party to have the benefit of it, leaving the agreement, still in full force, in its original form. That this parol agreement not being within the statute of frauds, would be enforced by this court if the power of attorney had not been executed; and not being merged in the power, ought now to be executed. That the power being incompetent to its object, the court will enforce the agreement against general creditors.

This argument is entitled to, and has received, very deliberate consideration.

The first inquiry respects the fact. Does this power of attorney purport to be the agreement? Is it an instrument collateral to the agreement? Or is it an execution of the agreement itself in the form intended by both the parties?

The bill states an offer on the part of Rousmanier to give a mortgage on the ves- [209] sels, either in the usual form, or in the form of an absolute bill of sale, the vendor taking a defeasance; but does not state any agreement for that particular security. The agreement stated in the bill is generally, that the plaintiff, in addition to the notes of Rousmanier, should have specific security on the vessels; and it alleges that the parties applied to counsel for advice respecting the most desirable mode of taking this security. On a comparison of the advantages and disadvantages of a mortgage, and an irrevocable power of attorney, counsel advised the latter instrument, and assigned reasons for his advice, the validity of which being admitted by the parties, the power of attorney was prepared and executed, and was received by the plaintiff as full security for his loans.

This is the case made by the amended bill; and it appears to the court to be a case in which the notes and power of attorney are admitted to be a complete consummation of the agreement. The thing stipulated was a collateral security on the Nereus and Industry. On advice of counsel, this power of attorney was selected, and given as that security. We think it a complete execution of that part of the agreement; as complete, though not as safe an execution of it, as a mortgage would have been.

It is contended that the letter of attorney does not contain all the terms of the agreement.

Neither would a bill of sale, nor a deed of mortgage, contain them. Neither instrument constitutes the agreement itself, but is that for which the agreement stipulated. The [210] agreement consisted of a loan of money on the part of Hunt, and of notes for its repayment, and of a collateral security on the Nereus and Industry, on the part of Rousmanier. The money was advanced, the notes were given, and this letter of attorney was, on advice of counsel, executed and received as the collateral security which Hunt required. The letter of attorney is as much an execution of that part of the agreement which stipulated a collateral security, as the notes are an execution of that part which stipulated that notes should be given.

But this power, although a complete security during the life of Rousmanier, has been rendered inoperative by his death. The legal character of the security was misunderstood by the parties. They did not suppose that the power would, in law, expire with Rousmanier.

The question for the consideration of the court is this: If money be advanced on a general stipulation to give security for its repayment on a specific article, and the parties deliberately, on advice of counsel, agree on a particular instrument, which is executed, but from a legal quality inherent in its nature, that was unknown to the parties, becomes extinct by the death of one of them, can a court of equity direct a new security of a different character to be given? or direct that to be done which the parties supposed would have been effected by the instrument agreed on between them?

This question has been very elaborately argued and every case has been cited which could 211* be supposed to bear upon it. No one of these cases decides the very question now before the court. It must depend on the the principles to be collected from them.

It is a general rule, that an agreement in writing, or an instrument carrying an agreement into execution, shall not be varied by parol testimony, stating conversations or circumstances anterior to the written instrument.

This rule is recognized in courts of equity as well as in courts of law; but courts of equity grant relief in cases of fraud and mistake, which cannot be obtained in courts of law. In such cases, a court of equity may carry the intention of the parties into execution, where the written agreement fails to express that intention.

In this case, there is no ingredient of fraud. Mistake is the sole ground on which the plaintiff comes into court; and that mistake is in the law. The fact is, in all respects, what it was supposed to be. The instrument taken is the instrument intended to be taken. But it is, contrary to the expectation of the parties, extinguished by an event not foreseen nor adverted to, and is, therefore, incapable of effecting the object for which it was given. Does a court of equity, in such a case, substitute a different instrument for that which has failed to effect its object?

In general, the mistakes against which a court of equity relieves, are mistakes in fact. The decisions on this subject, though not always very distinctly stated, appear to be founded on some misconception of fact. Yet some of 212* them bear a considerable analogy to that under consideration. Among these is that class of cases in which a joint obligation has been set up in equity against the representatives of a deceased obligor, who were discharged at law. If the principle of these decisions be that the bond was joint from a mere mistake of the law, and that the court will relieve against this mistake on the ground of the pre-existing equity arising from the advance of the money, it must be admitted that they have a strong bearing on the case at bar. But the judges in the courts of equity seem to have placed them on mistake in fact, arising from the ignorance of the draftsman. In Simpson v. Vaughan,<sup>1</sup> the bond was drawn by the obligor himself, and under circumstance which induced the court to be of opinion, that it was intended to be joint and several. In Underhill v. Howard,<sup>2</sup> Lord Eldon, speaking of cases in which a joint bond has been set up against the representatives of a deceased obligor, says: "The court has inferred from the nature of the condition, and the transaction, that it was made joint by mistake; that is, the instrument is not what the parties intended in fact. They intended a joint and several obligation; the scrivener has, by mistake, prepared a joint obligation."

All the cases in which the court has sustained a joint bond against the representatives of the deceased obligor, have turned upon a supposed mistake in drawing the bond. It was not until the case of Sumner v. Powell,<sup>3</sup> that [*213] anything was said by the judge who determined the cause, from which it might be inferred that relief in these cases would be afforded on any other principle than mistake in fact. In that case, the court refused its aid, because there was no equity antecedent to the obligation. In delivering his judgment, the master of the rolls (Sir W. Grant) indicated very clearly an opinion that a prior equitable consideration, received by the deceased, was indispensable to the setting up of a joint obligation against his representatives; and added, "so, where a joint bond has, in equity, been considered as several, there has been a credit previously given to the different persons who have entered into the obligation."

Had this case gone so far as to decide that "the credit previously given" was the sole ground on which a court of equity would consider a joint bond as several, it would have gone far to show that the equitable obligation remained, and might be enforced, after the legal obligation of the instrument had expired. But the case does not go so far. It does not change the principle on which the court had uniformly proceeded, nor discard the idea that relief is to be granted because the obligation was made joint by a mistake in point of fact. The case only decides, that this mistake, in point of fact, will not be presumed by the court in a case where no equity existed antecedent to the obligation, where no advantage was received *by, and no credit given to, the person, [*214] against whose estate the instrument is to be set up.

Yet the course of the court seems to be uniform, to presume a mistake in point of fact in every case where a joint obligation has been given, and a benefit has been received by the deceased obligor. No proof of actual mistake is required. The existence of an antecedent equity is sufficient. In cases attended by precisely the same circumstances, so far as respects mistake, relief will be given against the representatives of a deceased obligor, who had received the benefit of the obligation, and refused against the representatives of him who had not received it. Yet the legal obligation is as completely extinguished in the one case as in the other; and the facts stated, in some of the cases in which these decisions have been made, would rather conduce to the opinion that the bond was made joint from ignorance of the legal consequences of a joint obligation, than from any mistake in fact.

The case of Landsdowne v. Landsdowne (reported in Mosely), if it be law, has no inconsiderable bearing on this cause. The right of the heir at law was contested by a younger member of the family, and the arbitrator to whom the subject was referred decided against him. He executed a deed in compliance with this award, and was afterwards relieved against it, on the principle that he was ignorant of his title.

The case does not suppose this fact, that he was the eldest son, to have been unknown to him; and, if he was ignorant of anything, it was of the law, which gave him, as eldest [*215] son, the estate he had conveyed to a younger brother. Yet he was relieved in chancery against this conveyance. There are certain strong objections to this decision in other respects; but, as a case in which relief has been granted on a mistake in law, it cannot be entirely disregarded.

Although we do not find the naked principle, that relief may be granted on account of ignorance of law, asserted in the books, we find no case in which it has been decided, that a plain and acknowledged mistake in law is beyond the reach of equity. In the case of Lord Irnham v. Child,<sup>1</sup> application was made to the chancellor to establish a clause which had been, it was said, agreed upon, but which had been considered by the parties, and excluded from the written instrument by consent. It is true, they excluded the clause, from a mistaken opinion that it would make the contract usurious, but they did not believe that the legal effect of the contract was precisely the same as if the clause had been inserted. They weighed the consequences of inserting and omitting the clause, and preferred the latter. That, too, was a case to which the statute applied. Most of the cases which have been cited were within the statute of frauds, and it is not easy to say how much has been the influence of that statute on them.

The case cited by the respondent's counsel from precedents in chancery, is not of this description; *but it does not appear from that case, that the power of attorney was intended, or believed to be a lien.

In this case, the fact of mistake is placed beyond any controversy. It is averred in the bill, and admitted by the demurrer, that "the powers of attorney were given by the said Rousmanier, and received by the said Hunt, under the belief that they were, and with the intention that they should create, a specific lien and security on the said vessels."

We find no case which we think precisely in point; and are unwilling, where the effect of the instrument is acknowledged to have been entirely misunderstood by both parties, to say that a court of equity is incapable of affording relief.

The decree of the Circuit Court is reversed; but as this is a case in which creditors are concerned, the court, instead of giving a final decree on the demurrer in favor of the plaintiff, directs the cause to be remanded, that the Circuit Court may permit the defendants to withdraw their demurrer, and to answer to the bill.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the said Circuit Court erred in sustaining the demurrer of the defendants, and dismissing the bill of the complainant. It is therefore decreed and ordered that the decree 217* of the said Circuit Court *in this case be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled. And it is further ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said Circuit Court, with directions to permit the defendants to withdraw their demurrer, and to answer the bill of the complainants.

[LOCAL LAW. COVENANT.]

GOLDSBOROUGH, Plaintiff in Error,

v.

ORR, Defendant in Error.

Where the acts stipulated to be done, are to be done at different times, the covenants are to be construed as independent of each other.

Application of this principle to the peculiar circumstances of the present case.

Under the act of assembly of Maryland of 1795, c. 56, if the defendant appears, and dissolves the attachment, a declaration and subsequent pleadings are not necessary, as in other actions, but the cause may be tried upon a short note.

It seems, under the same act, that an attachment will not lie in a case ex contractu for unliquidated damages for the non-delivery of goods. But where the plaintiff is entitled to a stipulated sum of money, in lieu of a specific article to be delivered, an attachment will lie.

THIS cause was argued at the last term by Mr. Lear<sup>2</sup> for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Jones<sup>3</sup> for the defendant.

**Mr. Justice STORY* delivered the opinion—[*218 ion of the court:

This is a case originating under the attachment act of Maryland of 1795 (ch. 56), and brought to this court upon a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia, for Washington county. The suit was brought by Orr, the defendant in error, on what is

NOTE.—Independent covenants. Covenants may be wholly independent, although relating to the same subject, and made by the same parties, and included in the same instrument. In that case they are two separate contracts. Each party must then perform what he undertakes, without reference to the discharge of his obligation by the other party, and each party may have his action against the other for the non-performance of his agreement, whether he has performed his own or not.

H. GOLDSBOROUGH.

Washington, May 5, 1818.

*The agreement marked B, which is [*220 as follows, to wit:

It is agreed between Benjamin G. Orr, of the city of Washington, and Howes Goldsborough, of the state of Maryland, as follows, to wit:

The said Orr sells to said Goldsborough the three-story brick house adjoining the one now in the possession of Commodore Rodgers on P street south, with the coach-house and stable adjoining, and the lot on which they stand, being numbered three, and a lot numbered twenty-one, on O street south, for four thousand five hundred dollars.

The said Orr also sells to said Goldsborough, lots Nos. 9 and 10, and part of 11, in the same square, with the water privilege thereto belonging, for twelve and a half cents for each square foot which they contain, all of which sales are to be paid for in lumber, in the city of Washington, at the usual lumber-yard prices; one-half thereof to be deliverable the present year, the other half in the year 1819, as it may be wanted by the said Orr. The said Orr further agrees to take of the said Goldsborough as much more lumber, which, added to the amount of the above property, when calculated in money, as will make the whole amount to ten thousand dollars. And for such further amount to give his note, payable on the 15th day of February, in the year 1819, to the said Goldsborough. The titles to be made on demand, and the delivery of the lumber to be guaranteed by Commodore Rodgers. Washington, May 5th, 1818.

Received of Benjamin G. Orr, his note, payable on the 15th day of February, eighteen hundred and nineteen, for the sum of three thousand five hundred and ninety-four dollars, in compliance with his agreement, dated the 5th day of May, 1818.

H. GOLDSBOROUGH.

And further proved by a witness, that late in the winter, or in the spring of 1819, the defendant refused to deliver any more lumber to the orders of the plaintiff; the balance of lumber due under said contracts being duly demanded of the defendant by agent of the plaintiff; and it was admitted that the said houses and lots mentioned in said contracts had been duly conveyed according to agreement. And the defendant thereupon proved that he delivered lumber to the orders of the plaintiff to the amount of $7,986.11, according to a particular account thereof, which was produced, which includes the same amount of $2,428.33. mentioned in the first account A, the notes therein mentioned being payable in lumber, and the lumber given in discharge of the same, being charged in the general account B; and that he delivered lumber to the plaintiff's order, whenever called for, until the 15th of February, 1819, when the note filed in the cause, and mentioned in this defendant's receipt, fell due; that then, the said note not being paid by plaintiff, the defendant refused to deliver any more lumber, and the plaintiff requested said defendant to give him further time until some day in the April following to pay the said note (at which time he promised to take it up), and to continue the delivery of lumber to his orders as he might want it, until that day; and the witness, who was the defendant's agent, would have gone on to deliver the whole quantity, if it had been called for before the time limited as aforesaid for the payment of the note in April, not having been restricted by defendant's orders as to quantity; and that on the said day of April, the plaintiff again made default in paying the said note, and the defendant then refusing to deliver any more lumber, this suit was brought. If they believe the facts above stated to be true, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in the suit. Which direction the court refused to give. To which refusal, the defendant, by his counsel, excepts, &c.

And the parties have since annexed to the record, as a part thereof, the following explanatory statement:

Upon the argument of the cause in this court, the principal question has been whether the failure of Orr to pay the note of $3,594, constitutes a good defense to this suit. That there is a balance due to Orr of $2,919.89, for property actually conveyed by him to Goldsborough, under the agreements stated in the case, is most manifest; and the only point open for consideration is, whether the payment of the note is a condition precedent to the recovery of that balance. This must be decided by the terms of the written agreement B; for if the contract on one side be not dependent upon the performance of the contract on the other, or if they be not mutual and concurrent contracts, to be performed at the same time, there can be no doubt that the defense is unsupported. And, upon full consideration, we are all of opinion, that the contracts are not dependent or concurrent, by the true and necessary interpretation of that agreement. The agreement on the part of Orr was literally complied with. The titles to the property sold were duly made, the note was duly given, and Orr was at all times ready to receive the lumber according to his rights under the agreement. It is observable that one moiety of the lumber was deliverable in 1818; and as to this it is clear that the payment of the note could not be a condition precedent. The other moiety was deliverable in the year 1819, as it was wanted by Orr, and of course he might elect to demand the whole before, as well as after the note became due, at his pleasure. If this be so, it could not be within the contemplation of the parties, that the delivery of the lumber should be dependent upon the payment of the note, for the whole might be rightfully demanded before it became due. Nothing is better settled, both upon reason and authority, than the principle that where the acts stipulated to be done, are to be done at different times, the stipulations are to be construed as independent.

dent of each other. The parol enlargement of the time of payment of the note cannot be admitted to change the nature of the original agreement; nor is there any pretense to say that there was any waiver of the original agreement, even supposing that, in point of law, such a waiver could be insisted upon, in a case circumstanced like the present. For the parties recognized the existence of that agreement, and lumber continued to be delivered under it as Orr required. If, indeed, any waiver were to be implied, it would be a waiver by Goldsborough of a payment of the note as a condition precedent to the delivery of the lumber. But the parol contract does not, in any degree, vary the legal rights or obligations of the parties. The court below was, therefore, right in refusing the instruction prayed for by the counsel for the defendant.

After the argument, some difficulties occurred as to the nature and form of the proceedings under this attachment act; but upon hearing the parties again our doubts are entirely removed. One of the doubts was, whether, in cases of attachment, if the defendant appeared and dissolved the attachment, there ought not to be a declaration and subsequent pleadings, according to the course in ordinary actions. Upon the terms of the acts respecting attachments, we should have inclined to the opinion that such a declaration, and such pleadings, were necessary. But the practice is shown to have been otherwise, and that practice has been solemnly adjudged by the Court of Appeals of Maryland to be in conformity to law.<sup>1</sup> We have no disposition to disturb this construction.

Another doubt was, whether an attachment will lie in a case ex contractu, for unliquidated damages for non-delivery of goods. The act of 1795 gives the remedy upon the creditor's making oath, &c., that the debtor is bona fide indebted to him in a sum certain over all discounts, "and at the same time producing the bond or bonds, bill or bills, contested bill or bills of exchange, promissory note or notes, or other instrument or instruments in writing, account or accounts, by which the debtor is so indebted." This enumeration would seem to include such cases only of contract as were for payment of money, either certain in themselves, or for which debt, or indebitatus assumpsit, or actions of that nature, would lie. It does not seem to include a contract for the delivery of goods, or doing any other collateral act.<sup>2</sup> But, however this may be, and we give no opinion respecting it, we are satisfied that upon the contract in the present case, the plaintiff is entitled to a specific sum in money, so as to bring himself within the purview of the act. The value of the property sold was estimated in money; and though it was payable in lumber, yet if, upon demand, the defendant refused to deliver the lumber, he lost the benefit of that part of the contract, and the plaintiff became entitled to receive the sum stipulated to be paid in money.

Some objections were taken by the defendant to the preliminary proceedings in this suit; but it is unnecessary to consider them, because, whatever might have been their original defects, they are waived by going to trial upon the merits.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed with costs.<sup>2</sup>

SEXTON v. WHEATON ET UX.

228*] *Samuel Smith and others, v. Robert Gilmor and others, Garnishees of Wilhelm and Jan Willink.

Appeal from Baltimore County Court. In this case, an attachment issued on the 2d of February, 1805, in the names of the present appellants, against the lands, tenements, goods, chattels, and credits of Wilhelm and Jan Willink, under, and in virtue of a warrant from a justice of the peace of Baltimore county, directed to the clerk of the County Court of that county, accompanied by an affidavit and account, pursuant to the directions of the act of Assembly of 1795, ch. 56. At the same time the plaintiffs prosecuted a writ of capias ad respondendum against the defendants, and filed a short note, stating that the suit was brought to recover the sum of $14,094.84, due from the defendants to the plaintiffs, on account, and a copy thereof was sent with the said writ, indorsed, "to be set up at the court-house door by the sheriff." The attachment was returned by the sheriff, laid in the hands of Robert Gilmor and others (the appellees), and the writ of capias ad respondendum was returned tarde. The garnishees being called, appeared; and by their counsel pleaded that Wilhelm and Jan Willink did not assume, &c., and that at the time of laying the attachment, &c., they had no goods, &c., of the said Willinks in their hands. The general replication was put into the last plea, and issues were joined. Verdicts for the plaintiffs for $12,775 current money, damages. Motion by the garnishees in arrest of judgment, and the reason assigned was because no declaration had been filed in the case. The County Court sustained the motion, and arrested the judgment. The plaintiffs appealed to this court.

The case was argued in this court by Windor for the appellants, and by Martin and Harper for the appellees.

The Court of Appeals reversed the judgment of the County Court, and rendered judgment of condemnation on the verdicts for the plaintiffs for $12,775 current money, damages, together with $1,975.93 current money, additional damages and costs.

The statute 13 Eliz., c. 5, avoids all conveyances not made on a consideration deemed valuable in law, as against previous creditors.

But it does not apply to subsequent creditors, if the conveyance is not made with a fraudulent intent.

What circumstances will constitute evidence of such a fraudulent intent.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia and County of Washington.

This was a bill brought by the appellant, Sexton, in the court below, to subject a house and lot in the city of Washington, the legal title to which was in the defendant, Sally Wheaton, to the payment of a debt for which the plaintiff had obtained a judgment against her husband, Joseph Wheaton, the other defendant.

The lot was conveyed by John P. Van Ness, and Maria, his wife, and Clotworthy Stephenson, to the defendant, Sally Wheaton, by deed, bearing date the 21st day of March, 1807, for a valuable consideration, acknowledged to be received from the said Sally. And the plaintiff claimed to subject this property to the payment of his debt, upon the ground that the conveyance was fraudulent, and, therefore, void as to creditors.

The circumstances on which the plaintiff re-
230*] lied, *in his bill, to support the allegation of fraud, were, that the said house and lot were purchased by the defendant, Joseph, who, contemplating at the time carrying on the business of a merchant in the said city of Washington, procured the same to be conveyed to his wife; and obtained goods on the credit of his apparent ownership of valuable real property. That for the purpose of obtaining credit with the commercial house of the plaintiff, in New York, he represented himself, in his letters, as a man possessing real estate to the value of $20,000, comprehending the house in question, besides 100 bank shares, and other personal estate. That the defendant, Sally, knew and permitted these representations to be made. That the defendant, Joseph, in the presence of the defendant Sally, applied to General Dayton, the friend of the plaintiff, to be recommended to a commercial house in New York, and in the statement of his property, as an inducement to make such recommendation, he included the premises. That the defendant, Sally, permitted this misrepresentation, and did not undeceive General Dayton, although she had many opportunities of doing so.

In support of these allegations the plaintiff annexed to his bill several letters written by the defendant, Joseph, in the city of Washington, to the plaintiff, in the city of New York, soliciting a commercial connection, and advances of goods on credit. The first of these letters was dated the 2d of September, 1809. The letters stated that the plaintiff's house had been recommended to the defendant by their mutual friend General Dayton; *represented [*231 the defendant's fortune as considerable, spoke of the house in which he was to carry on business as his own, and held out the prospect of regular and ample remittances.

The bill farther stated that, upon the faith of these letters, and on the recommendation of General Dayton, the plaintiff advanced goods to the defendant, Joseph, to a considerable amount, who failed in making the promised remittances; and on the plaintiff's withholding farther supplies of goods, and pressing for payment, he avowed his inability to pay, declared himself to be insolvent, and then stated that the house in controversy was the property of his wife.

Some arrangements were made, by which the goods in the store, and the books of the defendant, Joseph, were delivered to the plaintiff; but, after paying some creditors who were preferred, a very small sum remained to be applied in discharge of a judgment which the plaintiff had obtained in January, 1812, for the sum of $8,249.29. On this judgment an execution was issued, by which the life estate of Joseph Wheaton was taken and sold for $300, the plaintiff being the purchaser.

The bill prayed that the property, subject to the plaintiff's interest therein under the said purchase, might be sold, and the proceeds of the sale applied to the payment of his judgment. It farther stated that improvements to a great amount had been made since the conveyance to Sally Wheaton, and prayed that, should the court sustain the said *con- [*232 conveyance the defendant, Sally, might be decreed to account for the value of those improvements.

NOTE.—Marriage Settlements.

A deed to wife or child, for love and affection, is not always void as to creditors. The mere fact of indebtedness to a small amount, the grantor being in good circumstances and the gift reasonable, will not render the deed fraudulent. Hinde's lessee v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. 199.

To render an ante-nuptial settlement void as to creditors, both parties must concur in the fraud. Maguiar v. Thompson, 7 Pet. 348.

A voluntary conveyance by a person not indebted at the time, in favor of wife or children cannot be impeached by subsequent creditors upon the mere ground of its being voluntary. It must be shown to have been fraudulent, or made with a view to future debts. Reade v. Livingston, 3 Johns. Ch. 501; Richardson v. Smallwood, Jac. 552; Bennett v. Bedford Bank, 11 Mass. 421.

The want of valuable consideration may be a badge of fraud; but it is only presumptive, and not conclusive evidence of it, and may be met and rebutted by evidence on the other side, as that the grantor was in prosperous circumstances, indebted to only a small amount, and was unembarrassed, and that the gift was a reasonable one, according to his state and condition in life, leaving enough for the payment of his debts.

Verplank v. Sterry, 12 John. 536, 554, 556, 557; Partridge v. Gopp, Ambler, 597, 598; S. C. 1 Eden, 167, 168, 169; Gilmore v. N. A. L. Co., Pet. C. C. 461; Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. 432, 434; Doc v. Routledge, Cowp. 705; Lush v. Wilkinson, 5 Ves. 387; Holloway v. Willard, 1 Madd. 414; Kidney v. Consmaker, 12 Ves. 155; Sagitary v. Hyde, 2 Vern. 44; Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. 277.

In Verplank v. Sterry, 12 John., supra, it is said by Mr. Justice Spencer: "If the person making the settlement is insolvent, or in doubtful circumstances, the settlement comes within the statute (of 13th of Elizabeth, ch. 5.) But if the grantor be not indebted to such a degree, as that the settlement will deprive the creditors of an ample fund for the payment of their debts, the consideration of natural love and affection will support the deed, although a voluntary one, against his creditors; for, in the language of the decisions, it is free from the imputation of fraud." Mr. Newland maintains the same principle. Newland on Contracts, ch. 23, p.

The answers denied that the house and lot in contest were purchased in the first instance by Joseph Wheaton, or conveyed to his wife with a view to his entering into commerce; and averred that they were purchased for Sally Wheaton, and chiefly paid for out of the profits made by her industry, and saved by her economy in the management of the affairs of the family while her husband was absent executing the duties of his office as sergeant-at-arms to the House of Representatives. The answers also stated that in January, 1807, when the conveyance was made, Joseph Wheaton was sergeant-at-arms to the House of Representatives, expected to continue in that office, had no intention of going into trade, and had no knowledge of the plaintiff. The design of going into commerce was first formed in the year 1809, when, being removed from his office, and having no hope of being re-instated in it, he turned his attention to that object as a means of supporting his family. He, then, in a letter dated the 24th of August, applied to General Dayton, as a friend, to recommend him to a house in New York, and received from that gentleman a letter dated the 29th of the same month, which is annexed to the answer. In this letter, General Dayton, says: "Pursuant to your request, I recommend to you the house of Messrs. Sexton & Williamson, with which to form the sort of connection which you propose, in New York. They have sufficient capital." &c. "The proper course 233*] will be for *you to write very particularly to them, stating your present advantageous situation, your prospects and plans of business, and describing the nature and extent of the connection which you propose to form with them, and then refer them to me for my knowledge of your capacity, industry, probity." &c., &c., &c.

The defendant, Joseph, in his answer, stated that in consequence of this letter, he wrote to the said house of Sexton & Williamson. He admitted that his account of his property was too favorable, but denied having made the statement for the purposes of fraud, but from having been himself deceived respecting its value. He denied having ever told General Dayton that the house was his, and thinks he declared it to be the property of his wife. Sally Wheaton denied that she ever heard her husband tell

General Dayton that the house was his property, that she ever in any manner contributed to impose on others the opinion that her husband was more opulent than he really was; or ever admitted that the house she claims was his. She admitted that she saw a letter prepared by him to be sent to Sexton & Williamson, in the autumn of 1809, which she thought made too flattering a representation of his property, and which she, therefore, dissuaded him from sending in its then form. She then hoped that her persuasions had been successful.

The answers of both defendants stated that Joseph Wheaton was free from debt when the conveyance was made, and insisted that it was made bona fide.

*The court below dismissed the bill, [*234 and from this decree the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. Key, for the appellants, argued, 1. That the evidence in the cause was insufficient to prove the fact alleged, that the house in question was purchased with the funds of the wife. The case of Slanning v. Style,<sup>1</sup> which is the stronger, as it excepts creditors from the operation of the right where it exists, goes to show that it was not bought with funds which could be considered as hers. The fund accruing from the thrift and economy of the wife does not constitute her separate estate.<sup>2</sup> Still less could such an accumulation for her separate use, from the presents of her friends, or as a compensation for services rendered her husband, be warranted by any case or principle.

2. If, then, the purchase was not made with the separate property of the wife, were the circumstances of the husband such, at the time this settlement was made, as to justify him in making it, to the prejudice of subsequent creditors? All the cases concur in showing that he cannot do so, and that the subsequent creditors may impeach it.<sup>3</sup> And it makes no difference that it is the case of a settlement by a purchase,

The cases appear to me to be, upon the point, uniformly in favor of the creditor." Reade v. Livingston, 3 John., Ch. 504.

The doctrine above stated in Hinde's Lessee v. Longworth, 11 Wheat, 109, is not easily reconcilable with that in Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch., 500, 501. See also *Holloway v. A marriage settlement while husband is heavily indebted is invalid. Kehr v. Smith, 30 Wall. 31.

Mere indebtedness of the husband at the time, will not alone make the settlement void; it must be shown that he was insolvent, or that the settlement had a tendency to impair the rights of creditors. Lloyd v. Fulton, 1 Otto, 479; Huner v. Scruggs, 4 Otto, 28.

Settlement by husband, not in debt, of one sixth of his estate on his wife, valid. Jones v. Clifton, 17 Am. L. Reg. 713; 6 Reporter, 324.

The doctrine in regard to voluntary settlements seems to have vibrated, both in this country and in England, between that laid down in Hinde's Lessee v. Longworth, 11 Wheat. 109 (stated above) and the doctrine (stated above), as laid down by Chancellor Kent in Reade v. Livingston, 3 John. Ch. 504. See Willards, Eq. Jur., 230 to 237.

235*] and the deed taken *to the wife. This notion of certain elementary writers<sup>1</sup> has been exploded, and the authorities are decisive against it.<sup>2</sup> Nor is there any difference between a deed to defraud subsequent creditors and one to defraud purchasers.<sup>3</sup> And a subsequent sale, after a voluntary settlement, creates the presumption of fraudulent intent in the previous settlement under the statute of 27 Eliz.<sup>4</sup> If so, there is the same ground for similar presumption where debts are contracted after a previous voluntary settlement. This must especially apply where the settlement is of all the settler's property, and the debts are large, and contracted almost immediately after the settlement.

3. But, supposing the settlement was fairly made, here is evidence of collusion of the wife in the misrepresentation which was made to the prejudice of creditors, and she is bound by it. The principle is well established that the property of a married woman, or that of an infant, may be rendered liable to creditors by their concurrence in acts of fraud.<sup>5</sup>

Mr. Jones, for the respondents, contra, insisted that many of the cases cited on the other 236*] side *might be disposed of upon their peculiar circumstances, without touching upon the general doctrine for which he contended. He admitted that whether a settlement was within the letter of the statutes relating to fraudulent conveyances or not, if there was actual fraud, a court of equity would lay hold upon it, and redress the injured party. But the settler must be indebted at the time of the execution of the deed, in order to set it aside on that ground. And there must be an allegation, and proof of that fact or the bill will be dismissed.<sup>6</sup> According to the original rudeness of the feudal system, the husband and wife were considered as one person, and all her rights of property were merged in his. But this is a doctrine wholly unknown to the civilized countries governed by the Roman code; and courts of equity have constantly struggled to mitigate its rigor. For this purpose they consider the husband as a trustee for the wife, in order to preserve her property to her separate use. It does not follow that because voluntary settlements are void against subsequent purchasers, that they are, therefore, void against subsequent creditors. There is a well-established and well-known distinction in this respect between the statute 13 Eliz. and the statute 27 Eliz. Taking the present case, then, as a mere voluntary conveyance on good consideration, independent of actual fraud, it must stand. Whatever discrepancy there may 237*] be in some of the old cases, this *is now the settled doctrine in England. Thus, in the case of a voluntary bond, and arrears under it, a conveyance to secure those arrears was sustained against creditors.<sup>7</sup> So, also, the substitution of a voluntary bond by another is good.<sup>8</sup> And a post-nuptial settlement is only void as against creditors at the time.<sup>9</sup> A voluntary conveyance in favor of strangers is valid against subsequent creditors, the party making it not being indebted at the time.<sup>10</sup> And in a very recent case, a voluntary settlement by a husband, not indebted at the time, was established against subsequent creditors.<sup>11</sup> But this is not a mere voluntary conveyance on a moral obligation; it is for a valuable consideration in the wife's services.<sup>12</sup> The case cited from 1 Cas. in Ch., 117, has no bearing on the present question, and has been overruled since. Besides, the case of Slanning v. Style<sup>13</sup> is better vouched, more modern, and of greater authority in every respect. The pretext of collusion in actual fraud between the husband and wife, in the present case, is utterly devoid of any foundation in the evidence.

*Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered [*238 the opinion of the court, and, after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The allegation that the house in question was purchased with a view to engaging in mercantile speculations, and conveyed to the wife for the purpose of protecting it from the debts which might be contracted in trade, being positively denied, and neither proved by testimony nor circumstances, may be put out of the case.

The allegation that the defendant, Sally, aided in practicing a fraud on the plaintiff, or in creating or giving countenance to the opinion that the defendant, Joseph, was more wealthy than in truth he was, is also expressly denied, nor is there any evidence in support of it, other than the admission in her answer that she had seen a letter written by him to the plaintiff, in the autumn of 1809, in which he gave, she thought, too flattering a picture of his circumstances. This admission is, however, to be taken with the accompanying explanation, in which she says that she had dissuaded him, she had hoped successfully, from sending the letter in its then form.

This fact does not, we think, fix upon the wife such a fraud as ought to impair her rights, whatever they may be.

The plaintiff could not know that this letter was seen by the wife, or in any manner sanctioned by, or known to her. He had, therefore, no right to suppose that there was any waiver of her interest, whatever it might be, nor had he a right to assume anything against her, or her claims, in consequence *of [*239 his receiving this letter. The case is very different from one in which the wife herself makes a misrepresentation, or hears and countenances the misrepresentation of her husband. The person who acts under such a misrepresentation, acts under his confidence in the good faith of the wife herself. He has a right to consider that faith as pledged; and if he is deceived, he may complain that she has herself deceived him. But in this case, the plaintiff acted solely on his confidence in the husband. If he was deceived, the wife was not accessory to the deception. She contributed nothing towards it. When she saw and disapproved the letter written by her husband, what more could be required from her than to dissuade him from sending it in that form? Believing, as we are bound to suppose she did, that the letter would be altered, what was it incumbent on her to do? All know and feel, the plaintiff as well as others, the sacredness of the connection between husband and wife. All know that the sweetness of social intercourse, the harmony of society, the happiness of families, depend on that mutual partiality which they feel, or that delicate forbearance which they manifest towards each other. Will any man say that Mrs. Wheaton, seeing this letter, remonstrating against it, and believing that it would be altered before sending it, ought to have written to this stranger in New York, to inform him that her husband had misrepresented his circumstances, and that credit ought not to be given to his letters? No man will say so. Confiding, as it was natural 240* and *amiable in her to confide, in his integrity, and believing that he had imposed on himself and meant no imposition on another, it was natural for her to suppose that his conduct would be influenced by her representations, and that his letter would be so modified as to give a less sanguine description of his circumstances. We cannot condemn her conduct.

A wife who is herself the instrument of deception, or who contributes to its success by countenancing it, may, with justice, be charged with the consequences of her conduct. But this is not such a case; and we consider the rights of Mrs. Wheaton as unimpaired by anything she is shown to have done.

Had the plaintiff heard this whole conversation, as stated in the answer; had he heard her express her disapprobation of the statements made in the letter, and dissuade her husband from sending it without changing its language; had he seen them separate, with a belief on her part that the proper alterations would be made in it he would have felt the injustice of charging her with participating in a fraud. That act cannot be criminal in a wife, because it was not communicated, which, if communicated, would be innocent. Admitting the representations of this letter to be untrue, they cannot be charged on the wife, since she disapproved of them, and believed that it would not be sent in its exceptionable form.

So much is a wife supposed to be under the control of her husband, that the law in this district will not permit her estate to pass by a conveyance executed by herself, until she has 241* been *examined apart from her husband by persons in whom the law confides, and has declared to them that she has executed the deed freely, and without constraint. It would be a strange inconsistency, if a court of chancery were to decree that the mere knowledge of a letter containing a misrepresentation respecting her property should produce a forfeiture of it, although she had not concurred in its statements, had dissuaded her husband from sending it, and believed he had not sent it.

Without discussing the conduct of Mr. Wheaton in this transaction, it is sufficient to say that it cannot affect the estate previously vested in the wife. The cause, therefore, must depend on the fairness and legality of the conveyance to her.

The allegation that the purchase money was derived from her private individual funds is supported by circumstances which may disclose fair motives for the conveyance, but which are not sufficient to prove that the consideration, in point of law, moved from her. It must, therefore, be considered as a voluntary conveyance; and, if sustained, must be sustained on the principle that it was made under circumstances which do not impeach its validity when so considered.

The bill does not charge Mr. Wheaton with having been indebted in January, 1807, when this conveyance was made. The fact that he was indebted cannot be assumed. Indeed, there is no ground in the record for assuming it. The answer avers that he was not indebted, and they are not contradicted by any testimony in the cause. *His inability to pay his debts [*242 in 1811, or 1812, is no proof of his having been in the same situation in January, 1807. The debts with which he was then overwhelmed were contracted after that date. This conveyance, therefore, must be considered as a voluntary settlement made on his wife, by a man who was not indebted at the time. Can it be sustained against subsequent creditors?

It would seem to be a consequence of that absolute power which a man possesses over his own property, that he may make any disposition of it which does not interfere with the existing rights of others, and such disposition, if it be fair and real, will be valid. The limitations on this power are those only which are prescribed by law.

The law which is considered by the plaintiff's counsel as limiting this power in the case at bar, is the statute of 13 Eliz., ch. 5, against fraudulent conveyances, which is understood to be in force in the county of Washington. That statute enacts that "for the avoiding and abolishing of feigned, covenous and fraudulent feoffments," &c., "which feoffments," &c., "are devised and contrived of malice, fraud, covin, collusion or guile, to the end, purpose and intent, to delay, hinder or defraud creditors and others of their just and lawful actions," &c., "not only to the let or hindrance of the due course and execution of law and justice, but also to the overthrow of all plain dealing, bargaining and chevisance between man and man. Be it, therefore, declared," &c., "that all and every feoffment," &c., "made to, or for, any intent or purpose before declared and expressed, shall be *from henceforth deemed [*243 ed and taken (only as against that person," &c., "whose actions," &c., "shall or might be in any wise disturbed," &c.), "to be clearly and utterly void."

In construing this statute the courts have considered every conveyance, not made on consideration deemed valuable in law, as void against previous creditors. With respect to subsequent creditors, the application of this statute appears to have admitted of some doubt.

In the case of Shaw v. Standish (2 Vern., 326), which was decided in 1695, it is said by counsel, in argument, "that there was a difference between purchasers and creditors, for the statute of 13 Eliz. makes not every voluntary conveyance, but only fraudulent conveyances, void as against creditors; so that, as to creditors, it is not sufficient to say the conveyance was voluntary, but must show they were creditors at the time of the conveyance made, or, by some other circumstances, make it appear that the conveyance was made with intent to deceive or defraud a creditor."

Although this distinction was taken in the case of a subsequent purchaser, and was, therefore, not essential in the cause which was before the court, and is advanced only by counsel in argument, yet it shows that the opinion that a voluntary conveyance was not absolutely void as to subsequent creditors, prevailed extensively.

In the case of Taylor v. Jones (2 Atk., 600), a bill was brought by creditors to be paid their debts out of stock vested by the husband, in trustees, for the benefit of himself for life, of his wife for life, and, afterwards for the benefit 244* of children. Lord Hardwicke decreed the deed of trust to be void against subsequent as well as preceding creditors.

There are circumstances in this case which appear to have influenced the chancellor, and to diminish its bearing on the naked question of a voluntary deed being absolutely void, merely because it is voluntary.

Lord Hardwicke said: "Now, in the present case, here is a trust left to the husband in the first place, under this deed; and his continuing in possession is fraudulent as to the creditors, the plaintiffs."

His lordship, afterwards, says: "And it is very probable that the creditors, after the settlement, trusted Edward Jones, the debtor, upon the supposition that he was the owner of this stock, upon seeing him in possession."

This case, undoubtedly, if standing alone, would go far in showing the opinion of Lord Hardwicke to have been that a voluntary conveyance would be void against subsequent, as well as preceding creditors; but the circumstances that the settler was indebted at the time, and remained in possession of the property as its apparent owner, were certainly material; and although they do not appear to have decided the cause, leave some doubt how far this opinion should apply to cases not attended by those circumstances.

This doubt is strengthened by observing Lord Hardwicke's language, in the case of Russell v. Hammond. His lordship said, "though he had hardly known one case where the person conveying was indebted at the time of the conveyance, 245* that the conveyance had not been fraudulent, yet that, to be sure, there were cases of voluntary settlement that were not fraudulent, and those were where the persons making them were not indebted at the time, in which case subsequent debts would not shake such settlements."

It would seem, from the opinion expressed in this case, that Taylor v. Jones must have been decided on its circumstances.

The case of Stillman v. Ashdown, and of Fitzer v. Fitzer and Stephens, reported in 2 Atk., have been much relied on by the appellant; but neither is thought to establish the principle for which he contends. In Stillman v. Ashdown the father had purchased an estate, which was conveyed jointly to himself and his son, and of which he remained in possession. After the death of the father, the son entered on the estate, and the bill was brought to subject it to the payment of a judgment against the father, in his life-time. The chancellor directed the estate to be sold, and one moiety to be paid to the creditor, and the residue to the son.

In giving his opinion, the chancellor put the case expressly on the ground that this, from its circumstances, was not to be considered as an advancement to the son. He says, too, "a father, here, was in possession of the whole estate, and must, necessarily, appear to be the visible owner of it; and the creditor, too, would have had a right, by virtue of an elegit, to have laid hold of a moiety, so that it differs extremely from all the other cases."

*In the same case the chancellor lays [*246] down the rules which he supposed to govern in the case of voluntary settlements. "It is not necessary," he says, "that a man should be actually indebted at the time of a voluntary settlement to make it fraudulent; for, if a man does it with a view to his being indebted at a future time, it is equally fraudulent, and ought to be set aside."

The real principle, then, of this case, is that a voluntary conveyance to a wife or child, made by a person not indebted at the time, is valid, unless it were made with a view to being indebted at a future time.

In the case of Fitzer v. Fitzer and Stephens the deed was set aside, because it was made for the benefit of the husband, and the principal point discussed was the consideration. The Lord Chancellor said: "It is certain that every conveyance of the husband that is voluntary, and for his own benefit, is fraudulent against creditors." After stating the operation of the deed, he added, "then consider it as an assignment which the husband himself may make use of to fence against creditors, and, consequently, it is fraudulent."

This case, then, does not decide that a conveyance to a wife or child is fraudulent against subsequent creditors because it is voluntary, but because it is made for the benefit of the settler, or with a view to the contracting of future debts.

The case of Peacock v. Monk, in 1 Vesey, turned on two points. The first was, that there was a proviso to the deed which amounted to a power of revocation, which, the chancellor said, *had always been considered as a [*247] mark of fraud; and, second, that, being executed on the same day with his will, it was to be considered as a testamentary act.

In the case of Walker v. Burrows (1 Atk., 94), Lord Hardwicke, adverting to the statute 13 Eliz., said that it was necessary to prove that the person conveying was indebted at the time of making the settlement, or immediately afterwards, in order to avoid the deed.

Lord Hardwicke maintained the same opinion in the case of Townshend v. Windham, reported in 2 Vesey. In that case he said: "If there is a voluntary conveyance of real estate, or chattel interest, by one not indebted at the time, though he afterwards becomes indebted, if that voluntary conveyance was for a child, and no particular evidence or badge of fraud to deceive or defraud subsequent creditors, that will be good; but if any mark of fraud, collusion or intent to deceive subsequent creditors appears, that will make it void; otherwise not; but it will stand, though afterwards he becomes indebted."

A review of all the decisions of Lord Hardwicke will show his opinion to have been that a voluntary conveyance to a child by a man not indebted at the time, if a real and bona fide conveyance, not made with a fraudulent intent, is good against subsequent creditors.

The decisions made since the time of Lord Hardwicke maintain the same principle.

In Stephens v. Olive (2 Bro. Ch. Rep., 90), Edward Olive, by deed dated the 7th of May, 248*] 1774, settled his real estate on himself for life, remainder to his wife for life, with remainders over for the benefit of his children. By another deed of the same date, he mortgaged the same estate to Philip Mighil, to secure the repayment of £500 with interest. On the 6th of March, 1775, he became indebted to George Stephens. This suit was brought by the executors of George Stephens to set aside the conveyance, because it was voluntary and fraudulent as to creditors. The master of the rolls held "that a settlement after marriage, in favor of the wife and children, by a person not indebted at the time, was good against subsequent creditors;" "and that, although the settler was indebted, yet, if the debt was secured by mortgage, the settlement was good."

In the case of Lush v. Williamson the husband conveyed leasehold estate in trust, to pay, after his decease, an annuity to his wife for life, and after her decease, the premises charged with the annuity for himself and his executors. A bill was brought by subsequent creditors to set aside this conveyance. The master of the rolls sustained the conveyance, and, after expressing his doubts of the right of the plaintiff to come into court without proving some antecedent debt, said, "a single debt will not do. Every man must be indebted for the common bills for his house, though he pays them every week. It must depend upon this whether he was in insolvent circumstances at the time."

In the case of Glaister v. Hewer (8 Ves., 199), where the husband, who was a trader, purchased lands, and took a conveyance to himself and wife, and afterwards became bankrupt and died, a suit was brought by the widow, against the assignees, to establish her interest. Two questions arose: 1. Whether the estate passed to the assignees under the statute of 1 James I., ch. 15.; and, if not, 2. Whether the conveyance to the wife was void as to creditors.

The master of the rolls decided both points in favor of the widow. Observing on the statute of the 13th of Eliz., he said that the conveyance would be good, supposing it to be perfectly voluntary; "for," he added, "though it is proved that the husband was a trader at the time of the settlement, there is no evidence that he was indebted at that time; and it is quite settled, that, under that statute, the party must be indebted at the time."

On an appeal to the lord chancellor, this decree was reversed, because he was of opinion that the conveyance was within the statute of James, though not within that of Elizabeth.

In the case of Battersbee v. Farrington and others (1 Swanst., 106), where a bill was brought to establish a voluntary settlement in favor of a wife and children, the master of the rolls said "no doubt can be entertained on this case, if the settler was not indebted at the date of the deed. A voluntary conveyance by a person not indebted is clearly good against future creditors. That constitutes the distinction between the two statutes. Fraud vitiates the transaction; but a settlement not [*250] fraudulent, by a party not indebted, is valid, though voluntary."

From these cases it appears that the construction of this statute is completely settled in England. We believe that the same construction has been maintained in the United States. A voluntary settlement in favor of a wife and children is not to be impeached by subsequent creditors, on the ground of its being voluntary.

We are to inquire, then, whether there are any badges of fraud attending this transaction which vitiate it.

What are those badges?

The appellant contends that the house and lot contained in this deed constituted the bulk of Joseph Wheaton's estate, and that the conveyance ought, on that account, to be deemed fraudulent.

This fact is not clearly proved. We do not know the amount of his estate in 1807; but if it were proved, it does not follow that the conveyance must be fraudulent. If a man, entirely unencumbered, has a right to make a voluntary settlement of a part of his estate, it is difficult to say how much of it he may settle. In the case of Stephens v. Olive the whole real estate appears to have been settled, subject to a mortgage for a debt of £500; yet that settlement was sustained. The proportional magnitude of the estate conveyed may awaken suspicion and strengthen other circumstances; but, taken alone, it cannot be considered as proof of fraud. A man who makes such a conveyance, necessarily impairs his credit, and, *if openly done, warns those with whom [*251] he deals not to trust him too far; but this is not fraud.

Another circumstance on which the appellant relies is the short period which intervened between the execution of this conveyance and the failure of Joseph Wheaton.

We admit that these two circumstances ought to be taken into view together; but do not think that, as this case stands, they establish a fraud.

There is no allegation in the bill, nor is there any reason to believe that any of the debts which pressed upon Wheaton at the time of his failure were contracted before he entered into commerce in 1809, which was more than two years after the execution of the deed. It appears that, at the date of its execution, he had no view to trade. Although his failure was not very remote from the date of the deed, yet the debts and the deed can in no manner be connected with each other; they are as distinct as if they had been a century apart. In the case of Stephens v. Olive the debt was contracted in less than twelve months after the settlement was made; yet it could not overreach the settlement.

These circumstances, then, both occurred in the case of Stephens v. Olive, and were not considered as affecting the validity of that deed. The reasons why they should not be considered in this case as indicating fraud, are stronger than in England. In this district every deed must be recorded in a place prescribed by law. All titles to land are placed upon the record. The person who trusts another on the faith of 252* his real property, *knows where he may apply to ascertain the nature of the title held by the person to whom he is about to give credit. In this case, the title never was in Joseph Wheaton. His creditors, therefore, never had a right to trust him on the faith of this house and lot.

A circumstance much relied on by the appellant is the controversy which appears to have subsisted about that time between the post-office department and Wheaton. This circumstance may have had some influence on the transaction; but the court is not authorized to say that it had. The claim of the post-office department was not a debt. On its adjustment Wheaton was proved to be the creditor instead of debtor.

It would be going too far to say that this conveyance was fraudulent to avoid a claim made by a person who was, in truth, the debtor, where there is nothing on which to found the suspicion but the single fact that such a claim was understood to exist.

The claim for the improvements stands on the same footing with that for the lot. They appear to have been inconsiderable, and to have been made before these debts were contracted.

1.—Mr. Atherley, in his able treatise on the Law of Marriage and other Family Settlements, controverts, on principle, the doctrine that a voluntary settlement is good against subsequent creditors, if the settler was not indebted at the time he made it, although he admits that it is the law in England, as established by the decisions of the courts of equity, pp. 230-237, 175, 176, 209-220. ## THE UNITED STATES v. WILSON.

An insolvent debtor who has received a certificate of discharge from arrest and imprisonment under a state insolvent law, is not entitled to be discharged from execution at the suit of the United States.

THIS cause was brought before this court upon a certificate of a division of opinion between the judges of the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York.

The defendant was taken on the 16th of July, 1819, in execution by the marshal, upon a judgment obtained against him at the suit of the United States, in the District Court for the Southern District of New York, and committed to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of New York, under an act of the legislature of the state of New York, passed April, 1813,<sup>2</sup> and subsequently received his *certificate of discharge under the act [*254 of the said state, passed April, 1819, entitled, "an act for abolishing imprisonment for debt."]<sup>3</sup> A motion was made in the court below for the defendant's discharge from custody on the ca. sa. issued against him at the suit of the United States; and on the question whether he was entitled to his discharge, the judges were divided in opinion, and the division was thereupon certified to this court.

[CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE.]

THE UNITED STATES.

Collusive captures and violations of the revenue laws, committed by a private armed vessel, are a breach of the condition of the bond given by the owners, under the prize act of June 26, 1812, c. 430, s. 3. If such breach appear upon demurrer, the defendants are not entitled to a hearing in equity under the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 26.

THIS cause came before the court upon a certificate of a division of opinion between the judges of the Circuit Court of Maine.

It was an action of debt, originally brought in the District Court of Maine, by the United States, against the defendants in that court, Grceley and others, upon a bond executed by them on the 17th of December, 1813, under the prize act of June 26th, 1812, c. 430, s. 3, as owners of the private armed vessel called the Fly, conditioned that “the owners, officers and crew of the said armed vessel shall observe the laws and treaties of the United States [*258 and the instructions which shall be given according to law for the regulation of their conduct, and satisfy all damages and injuries which shall be done or committed contrary to the tenor thereof, by such vessel, during her commission, and deliver up the same when revoked by the President of the United States.” The defendants pleaded a performance of this condition; to which the district attorney replied that on the 15th day of December, 1813, at a place called St. Johns, the same being a colony and dependency of Great Britain, certain goods, &c., the same being of the growth, produce and manufacture of Great Britain, or some colony or dependency thereof, the importation whereof into the said states, then and for a long time afterwards, and at the time of bringing the same into the said district of Maine, was, by law, prohibited, were put on board a certain vessel or schooner called the George, with the intention to import the same into the said states, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the statute in such case made and provided, and with the knowledge of the master of the said schooner George; and afterwards, in pursuance of said intention, the said schooner did depart from the said place of lading, to wit, St. Johns, and there, afterwards, on the high seas, by way of collusion, and with intent to evade the statute aforesaid, and under color of capture by the private armed vessel called the Fly, aforesaid, to import the said goods, &c., into the said states, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the statute aforesaid, the said schooner George, so *laden as aforesaid, was [*259 taken possession of by the said Dekoven, by and with the said private armed vessel called the Fly, whereof the said Dekoven then and there was master as aforesaid, on the high seas, and afterwards, on the 24th day of January, der such execution, and he shall be accordingly discharged, and shall not be liable to be imprisoned again for the said debt; but the judgment shall remain good and sufficient in law, and may be satisfied out of any estate which may then, or at any time afterwards, belong to the debtor.”

1.—He cited Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. Rep. 136; Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. Rep. 1, and referred to the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 34; the bankrupt act of 1800, c. 173, s. 61, and the priority act of 1799, c. 128, s. 65.

2.—See the United States v. Hoar, 2 Mason’s Rep. 311, where it was determined, that the local statutes of limitations of the different states do not bind the United States in suits in the national courts, and cannot be pleaded in bar of an action by the United States against individuals. In that case it was held that the statutes of limitation of Massachusetts did not apply even to suits by the state government in the state courts, and that the 34th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, which provides, “that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply,” could not have meant to enlarge the construction of the statute of Massachusetts. “It is most manifest,” says Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the judgment of the Circuit Court in the case referred to, “that these terms give the same efficacy, and none other, to those statutes, in the federal, that they have (proprio vigore) in the state courts. And yet, unless this doctrine of enlargement can be maintained, it is difficult to perceive on what ground the case of the defendant can be supported. The statutes of Massachusetts could not originally have contemplated suits by the United States, not because they were in substance enacted before the federal constitution was adopted, on which I lay no stress, but because it was not within the legitimate exercise of the powers of the state legislature. It is not to be presumed that a state legislature mean to transcend their constitutional powers; and, therefore, however general the words may be, they are always restrained to persons and things over which the jurisdiction of the state may be rightfully exerted. And if a construction could ever be justified, which should include the United States, at the same time that it excluded the state, it is not to be presumed that Congress could intend to sanction a usurpation of power by a [*257 state, to regulate and control the rights of the United States. In the language of the act of 1789, it could not be a case where the laws of the state could apply. The mischiefs, too, of such a construction, would be very great. The public rights, revenue and property, would be subject to the arbitrary limitations of the states; and the limitations are so various in these states that the government would hold its rights by a different tenure in each.” Id. p. 315.

1814, the said schooner George, and the goods, &c., aforesaid, were brought into the port of Ellsworth, in the said district of Maine, and the goods, &c., were then and there, under color of capture by said Dekoven, his officers and crew, in and with said schooner Fly, imported, in manner aforesaid, into the said states, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the statute aforesaid. Other pleadings followed (which it is not necessary to state), ending with a demurrer, upon which the District Court was of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. The defendants thereupon moved for a hearing in chancery upon the making up of the judgment on the bond declared on, which motion was denied, and judgment rendered for the United States. The cause was then brought by writ of error to the Circuit Court, the judges of which were divided in opinion upon the following questions, which were thereupon certified to this court:

1. Whether an American private armed vessel, duly commissioned, making collusive captures of enemy's property during the late war with Great Britain, and under color of such capture introducing goods and merchandise into the United States, contrary to the provisions of the act of March 1, 1809, c. 195, revived and continued in force by the act of 260* March 2, 1811, c. 306, thereby *broke the condition of the bond given pursuant to the third section of the statute of June 26, 1812, c. 430, requiring "that the owners, officers and crew, who shall be employed on board such commissioned vessel, shall and will observe the treaties and laws of the United States."

2. Whether, if such proceeding on the part of such private armed vessel be a breach of the condition of said bond, and such breach appear upon demurrer, the defendants can by law claim a hearing in chancery, under the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, c. 20, s. 26.

The cause was briefly argued by Mr. Webster for the plaintiffs in error, and by Mr. Pitman for the United States.

The court directed the following certificate to be sent to the Circuit Court:

CERTIFICATE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Court of the United States for the First Circuit in the District of Maine, on the points on which the judges of that court were divided in opinion, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion:

1. That an American private armed vessel, duly commissioned, making collusive captures of enemy's property during the late war with Great Britain, and under color of such captures introducing goods and merchandise into the United States, contrary to the provisions of the act of March 1, 1809, c. 195, revived and continued in *force by the act of March 2, 1811, c. 306, thereby broke the condition of the bond given pursuant to the third section of the statute of June 26th, 1812, c. 430, requiring "that the owners, officers and crew, who shall be employed on board such commissioned vessel, shall and will observe the treaties and laws of the United States."

2. That where such breach appears upon demurrer, the defendants cannot, by law, claim a hearing under the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, c. 20, s. 26.

THE EXPERIMENT.

In cases of collusive capture, papers found on board one captured vessel may be invoked into the case of another captured on the same cruise.

A commission obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations, will not vest the interest of prize.

But collusive capture made under a commission is not, per se, evidence that the commission was fraudulently obtained.

A collusive capture vests no title in the captors, not because the commission is thereby made void, but because the captors thereby forfeit all title to the prize property.

APPEAL from the decree of the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, affirming the decree of the District Court of Maine, by which the sloop Experiment and cargo were condemned to the United States, as having been collusively captured by *the private armed [*262 schooner Fly. The facts (so far as necessary) are stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. Webster, for the appellants, argued, that this case was distinguishable in its circumstances from that of The George,<sup>1</sup> captured by the same privateer, and adjudged by this court to be a collusive capture.

Mr. Pitman, for the United States, argued upon the facts with great minuteness and ability, to show that the capture was made mala fide. He also contended that the captors, who had obtained their commission for the fraudulent purpose of violating the laws of the United States, and who had been detected by this court in an attempt to impose on it in a former case,<sup>2</sup> could not be entitled to derive any benefit from their commission, even supposing the capture in the present instance not to be collusive. The court had already settled certain principles analogous to that on which he insisted. Thus, it has been determined, that if a neutral ship-owner lend his name to cover a fraud with regard to the cargo, this will subject the ship to confiscation.<sup>3</sup> So, if a party attempt to impose upon the court by knowingly or fraudulently claiming as his own property belonging in part to others, he will not be entitled *to restitution of that portion [*263 which he may ultimately establish as his own.<sup>4</sup> And in the case of The Anne, the court distinctly recognize the principle that fraud will forfeit all rights to which captors might otherwise have been entitled under their commission.<sup>5</sup> He also cited authorities to show that the court would take notice of facts which came judicially into their view in the case with which this was

3.—The St. Nicholas, 1 Wheat. Rep. 417; The Fortuna, 3 Wheat. Rep. 236.

4.—The Dos Hermanos, 2 Wheat. Rep. 76.

so closely associated, and would severely scrutinize the conduct of the same parties in a similar transaction.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a prize cause, brought by appeal from the Circuit Court of Massachusetts, affirming, pro forma, the decree of the District Court of Maine. The sloop Experiment and cargo are confessedly British property, and were captured by the privateer Fly during the late war, and brought into port, and proceeded against by the captors in the proper court, for the purpose of being adjudged lawful prize. No claim was filed in behalf of the captured, but the United States interposed a claim, upon the ground that the capture was fraudulent and collusive, and the cargo was introduced into the country in violation of the non-importation acts then in force, which prohibited the importation of goods 264* of British manufacture, *as the goods comprising this cargo certainly were. Upon the trial in the court below, the claim of the United States was sustained, and the capture being adjudged collusive, a condemnation was decreed to the government. From that decree the captors have appealed to this court, and the cause now stands for judgment as well upon the original evidence as the farther proofs which have been produced by the parties in this court.

The privateer is the same whose conduct came under consideration in the case of The George, reported in 1 Wheat. Rep., 408, and 2 Wheat. Rep., 278, and was there adjudged to have been collusive. The present capture was made during the same cruise, by the same crew, and about six days only before the capture of the George. Under an order of the court, the original papers and proceedings in the case of The George have been invoked into this cause; and after a long interval, during which the parties have had the most ample opportunities to clear the case of any unfounded suspicions, the decision of the court upon the arguments at the bar is finally to be pronounced.

At the threshold of the cause, we are met by the question whether a party claiming under a commission which he has obtained from the government by fraud, or has used in a fraudulent manner, can acquire any right to captures made in virtue of such commission. Undoubtedly a commission may be forfeited by grossly illegal conduct; and a commission fraudulently obtained is, as to vesting the interests of prize, utterly void. But a commission may be law-265* fully obtained, although *the parties intend to use it as a cover for illegal purposes. It is one thing to procure a commission by fraud, and another to abuse it for bad purposes. And if a commission is fairly obtained, without imposition or fraud upon the officers of government, it is not void merely because the parties privately intend to violate, under its protection, the laws of their country. The abuse, therefore, of the commission is not, per se, evidence that it was originally obtained by fraud and imposition. The illegal acts of the parties are sufficiently punished by depriving them of the fruits of their unlawful enterprises. A collusive capture conveys no title to the captors. Not because the commission is thereby made void, but because the captors thereby forfeit all title to the prize property.

And after all, while the commission is unrevoked, it must still remain a question upon each distinct capture, upon the evidence regularly before the prize court, whether there be any fraud in the original concoction, or in the conduct of the cruise. We cannot draw in aid the evidence which exclusively belongs to another cause, to fix fraud upon the transaction, unless so far as, upon the general principles of prize proceedings, it may be properly invoked. The present case, then, must depend upon its own circumstances.

It cannot, however, escape the attention of the court, that this privateer has already been detected in a gross case of collusive capture, on the same cruise, and under the same commission. This is a fact, of which, sitting as a court of admiralty, *we are bound to [*266 take notice; and it certainly raises a presumption of ill faith in other transactions of the same parties, which can be removed only by clear evidence of honest conduct. If the circumstances of other captures, during the same cruise, are such as lead to serious doubts of the fairness of their character, every presumption against them is greatly strengthened; and suspicions once justly excited in this way, ought not to be easily satisfied. The captors have had full notice of the difficulties of their case, and after an order for farther proof, which should awaken extraordinary diligence, they cannot complain that the court does not yield implicit belief to new testimony, when it comes laden with grave contradictions, or is opposed by other unsuspected proofs.

Many of the circumstances, which were thought by the court to be entitled to great weight in the decision of The George, have also occurred in the present case. The original equipment, ownership, shipping articles, and conduct of the cruiser, are of course the same. The stay at Machias, the absence of Lieut. Sebor, the very suspicious nature of his journey, the apparent connection of that journey with persons and objects in the immediate vicinity of the place where the voyage of the prize commenced, are distinctly in proof. The bad equipment of the prize, her indifferent condition, and small crew for the voyage, the nature of her cargo, and the flimsy pretenses set up for the enterprise, in the letters on board, are circumstances of suspicion, quite as strongly made *out as in The George. The conduct [*267 of the prize during her ostensible voyage was still more striking. She was far out of the ordinary course of the voyage, without any necessity, or even plausible excuse. She chose voluntarily to sail along the American coast, out of the tract of her voyage, even at the moment when she affected to have notice that the Fly was on a cruise; and she exposed herself to capture in a manner that can scarcely be accounted for, except upon the supposition of collusion. The pretense set up for this conduct is exceedingly slight and unsatisfactory. The circumstances of the capture, too, as they come from the testimony of some of the captors, as well as from a disinterested witness, are not calculated to allay any doubt. Here, as in The George, all of the prize crew, excepting one, were dismissed without any effort to hold them as prisoners, and without any apparent reason for the dismissal. And if the testimony of one of the captors is to be believed, there is entire proof that the prize was long expected, and came as a known friend under preconcerted signals. It may be added, that the testimony of the captors is, in some material respects, inconsistent; and if the testimony of two disinterested and respectable witnesses is to be credited, the master of the prize, in opposition to his present testimony, admitted, in the most explicit manner, that the capture was collusive.

We do not think that it would conduce to any useful purpose to review the evidence at large. It appears to us to be a case where the 268* circumstances *of collusion are quite as strong, if not stronger, than in The George.

And we are therefore of opinion, that the decree of condemnation of the prize and her cargo, to the United States, ought to be affirmed, with costs.

[CHANCERY. LIEN. ASSIGNMENT.]

SETH SPRING AND SONS, Appellants,

THE SOUTH CAROLINA INSURANCE COMPANY, GRAY & PINDAR, WILLIAM LINDSAY, AND JOHN HASLETT, Respondents.

An insolvent debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another in paying an assignment bona fide made, and no subsequent attachment, or subsequently acquired lien, will avoid the assignment.

Such an assignment may include choses in action, as a policy of insurance, and will entitle the assignee to receive from the underwriters the amount insured in case of a loss. It is not necessary that the assignment should be accompanied by an actual delivery of the policy.

Upon a bill of interpleader, filed by underwriters against the different creditors of an insolvent debtor, claiming the fund proceeding from an insurance made for account of the debtor, some on the ground of special liens, and others under the assignment, the rights of the respective parties will be determined. But, on such a bill, those of the co-defendants who fail in establishing any right to the fund, are not entitled to an account from the defendant whose claims are allowed, of the amount and origin of those claims.

On a bill of interpleader, the plaintiffs are in general entitled to their costs out of the fund. Where the money is not brought into court, they must pay interest upon it.

269* *An insurance broker is entitled to a lien on the policy for premiums paid by him on account of his principal; and though he parts with the possession, if the policy afterwards comes into his hands again, his lien is revived, unless the manner of his parting with it manifests his intention to abandon the lien. In such a case, an intermediate assignee takes cum onere.

But in the case of other liens acquired on the policy, if it be assigned, bona fide, for a valuable consideration, while out of the possession of the person acquiring the lien, and afterwards return into his hands, the lien does not revive as against the assignee.

Evidence that a subscribing witness to a deed had been diligently inquired after, having gone to sea, and been absent for four years, without having been heard from, is sufficient to let in secondary proof of his handwriting.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court of South Carolina.

This was a bill of interpleader, filed by the South Carolina Insurance Company in the court below, on the 25th of April, 1816, against the appellants, and Gray & Pindar, William Lindsay, and John Haslett; praying that they might file their answers, and interplead, so that it might be determined to whom the proceeds of a certain policy of insurance should be paid. It appeared by the pleadings, and the evidence in the cause, that this policy had been made on the 6th of May, 1811, by the respondents, the South Carolina Insurance Company, upon a vessel called the Abigail Ann, then lying at Savannah, on a voyage to Dublin, or a port in St. George's Channel, for account of John H. Dearborne, and the respondents, Gray & Pindar, the latter of whom were merchants residing at Charleston, South Carolina, and at that time part owners of the ship, but, on the 27th of May, 1811, sold their interest therein to *Dearborne. On the 5th of July, 1811, [*270 the vessel sailed on the voyage insured. It appeared that the respondent, Lindsay, as the agent of the parties, had procured this policy to be underwritten. It also appeared that Lindsay had delivered the policy to Gray & Pindar, for the use of Gray & Pindar, and Dearborne, without at the same time expressly claiming any lien upon it.

After the sailing of the Abigail Ann, Dearborne, and Gray & Pindar, jointly purchased and loaded another ship, called the Levi Dearborne, of which vessel and cargo Dearborne owned two-thirds, and Gray & Pindar one-third. In September, 1811, this vessel sailed from Savannah for Europe, and Dearborne went in her. Before sailing, D. had drawn bills on England, some of which were indorsed and negotiated by Lindsay, which were returned protested for non-acceptance, and Lindsay was compelled to pay them. Haslett also made advances to Dearborne, and took his bills on England, secured by a bottomry bond on the ship Levi Dearborne. These bills also returned protested.

Before Dearborne left Savannah, certain misunderstanding arose between him and Gray & Pindar, which it was agreed should be referred to arbitrators. On the 21st of September, 1811, the arbitrators, and one Harford, as umpire, awarded that Gray & Pindar should execute a bill of sale of the ship Abigail Ann to Dearborne, and deliver to him the policy of insurance thereon, without unnecessary delay. Before he sailed, Dearborne directed Harford to transmit to his wife, in the *district [*271 of Maine, to the care of Seth Spring & Sons, the bill of sale and policy of insurance which had been thus awarded to him. The policy was subsequently sent by Harford to Lindsay, to be put in suit against the South Carolina Insurance Company.

The ship Levi Dearborne was obliged to put into New York by stress of weather, and there Dearborne, on the 28th of October, 1811, made an assignment of the Abigail Ann, and of his interest in the ship Levi Dearborne, and of the policies upon both vessels, to S. Spring & Sons, to secure the payment of a debt due by Dearborne to them, amounting to about $16,000. The handwriting of Dearborne, and of the subscribing witness to the deed of assignment, were both proved; and one Maria Teubner, who testified to that of the subscribing witness, swore that she was one of his creditors, and had taken pains to obtain information of where he was, but without success. The last account of him was that he had entered on board of an American privateer, during the late war, and had not been heard of for four years. The assignment was made subject to pay out of the cargo of the Abigail Ann, if it reached the hands of his correspondents in England, certain bills which he had drawn on them, in the confidence that they would be paid out of the cargo of the Levi Dearborne. Nothing was realized from that vessel and cargo, and the Abigail Ann was lost at sea. An action was brought upon the policy on the Abigail Ann, in the names of Dearborne, and Gray & Pindar, *against the South Carolina Insurance Company, and judgment obtained against the latter, in 1815, for the sum of $9,800. Dearborne died in March, 1813. On the 24th of February, 1812, Lindsay, on the return of the bills indorsed by him, issued an attachment under the laws of South Carolina against Dearborne, who was then absent from that state, and served a copy upon the South Carolina Insurance Company. On the 21st of May, 1812, Haslett also issued an attachment against Dearborne, and served a copy on the South Carolina Insurance Company. No appearance was entered for Dearborne in these attachment suits, and judgment was obtained on Lindsay's on the 19th of April, 1813, and on Haslett's on the 10th of June, 1815.

At the hearing in the court below, after the depositions and regularly proved exhibits in the cause had been read, an order signed by Harford, as agent for Dearborne, and S. Spring & Sons, on Lindsay, in favor of Haslett, was read in evidence, without notice to the appellants, or an order for its being read at the hearing.

The Circuit Court decreed that the demand of Lindsay should be first satisfied, and paid out of the fund; that of Gray & Pindar next; that of S. Spring & Sons next; that Haslett was entitled to the surplus, if any; and that S. Spring & Sons should account, and prove their claims against Dearborne, either by filing a cross-bill, or by answering upon interrogatories.

From this decree an appeal was taken by S. Spring & Sons to this court.

*273* M. Wheaton, for the appellants, stated, 1. That he would first clear the case of all extraneous matters, and for this purpose would throw out of it both Haslett's and Lindsay's claim. The former was justly postponed to that of S. Spring & Sons, by the court below; he has not appealed, and could have no claim under the attachment suits, for Dearborne died before his suit was even commenced. The claim of Lindsay (so as it arises from his attachment), must also be rejected on two grounds: 1st. The policy of insurance on the Abigail Ann had been transferred long before his suit. 2d. It was abated by the death of Dearborne. This was understood to be the local law as established by the decisions of the courts of South Carolina.<sup>1</sup> The order, dated the 23d of May, 1813, and signed by Harford, as Dearborne's agent, and read in evidence as an exhibit, must also be excluded from the cause. There is no evidence that he was the agent of Dearborne for this purpose; and even if he had been, the paper was irregularly introduced. It is the settled practice of the Court of Chancery, wherever anything like a regular practice prevails; that no exhibit can be proved at the hearing, without satisfactory reasons why it was not proved in the usual way before the examiner; and if proved at the hearing, a cross-examination of the witnesses is always allowed. And an order must be previously obtained, or, at least, notice given.<sup>2</sup>

*The decree below seems to be mainly founded on Harford's order, thus irregularly interpolated into the cause. Before the pretended liens of Gray & Pindar, and of Lindsay, had attached, the assignment had vested the property in the appellants, S. Spring & Sons. Lindsay, after he had delivered up the policy, and an intermediate transfer of it to bonæ fidei purchasers, could not, by again obtaining possession of it, without the consent of such purchasers, regain his lien, even if he ever had one. His possession was wrongful; and if rightful, he had no right to retain for a general balance. The lien of a policy broker is confined to his general balance on policy transactions and does not extend to other debts.<sup>3</sup> Properly speaking, there is no such thing as a lien by contract. Liens are created by the law, and pledges by contract. But no express pledge is proved in this case. Neither can the analogy of the law of stoppage, in transitu, be applied where the property has already been transferred to a creditor or other bonæ fidei purchaser.

3. In a bill of interpleader, all the parties are actors. Each party states his own claim, and the admission of no one is evidence against another. The appellants are not bound by the admission of the other co-defendants. They do not admit any such liens as are set up by the other parties, and no evidence is produced of their existence, except the order of Harford, which cannot be admitted. Non constat when that order was executed. It *might [*275 have been at the very moment before the hearing; and the bare possibility of this shows the danger of permitting it to be read in evidence without notice and without cross-examination.

4. There are, besides, several formal objections. The plaintiffs below do not offer to bring the money into court, nor is there any affidavit accompanying the bill, and showing that it was filed without collusion. The want of this was a ground of demurrer, and they are clearly not entitled to their costs out of the fund.<sup>4</sup> The appellants are the only parties who, in answering, insist on their rights; the others merely pray to be dismissed.

Mr. Cheves, contra, stated that there were four claims in this case.

1. That of Haslett.
2. That of Lindsay.
3. That of Gray & Pindar.
4. That of the appellants, S. Spring & Sons.

1. The decree adjudges the surplus, if any, to Haslett, after payment of the other claims. But he has no claim upon the fund in controversy, unless it arises under his attachment. The case of Crocker v. Radcliffe, referred to on the other side, is not before the court in a shape in which the precise point decided can be known. The point said to have been ruled in that case appears to have been determined otherwise in a previous case;<sup>1</sup> and the principle 276 of this last decision appears to be correct. The proceeding by attachment is a proceeding in rem, and, therefore, ought not to abate by the death of the party. It is probable that in Crocker v. Radcliffe nothing had been attached upon the process, and, therefore, the suit was adjudged to abate by the defendant's death; but in the present case the fund in question was attached and is bound by that attachment, subject only to the previous liens.

2. Lindsay's claim is supported by the law of liens.<sup>2</sup> Though he may have parted with possession of the policy for a time, upon regaining it his lien was re-established.<sup>3</sup> But if the lien of Gray & Pindar, to whom he parted with the possession, be established, that will cover his claim, they being prior indorsers on the bills which form his demand, and their claim also embracing those bills.

3. The claim of Gray & Pindar is supported by express contract, as well as the general law of lien. The express contract is supported by the testimony of Harford. The implied lien is supported by the possession of Lindsay, which was the possession of Gray & Pindar until he delivered it to them, and afterwards by the possession of Harford, whose possession also was their possession. Their lien embraces as well the bills which they indorsed for Dearborne, that were returned protested for non-payment, and were paid by Lindsay, as the 277 sums they have actually paid. *The case of Mann v. Shiffner<sup>4</sup> covers the whole of this claim. Manual possession is not necessary. It is the power to control the possession which gives the lien.<sup>5</sup> The award did not impair the lien without the acquiescence of Gray & Pindar and the surrender of the possession of the policy. It did not even give a right to the possession. The only remedy was an action on the award.<sup>6</sup> But the award itself was not valid. The testimony of Harford proves that the indemnity of Gray & Pindar for their indorsement of Dearborne's bills was one of the points submitted, and as it was not determined, the award is void.<sup>7</sup>

4. The claim of the appellants, S. Spring & Sons, is not sufficiently proved. They have not proved either the deed of assignment under which they claim, or the debt for which they claim. The subscribing witness to the deed is not produced or examined.<sup>8</sup> The testimony to prove his handwriting is doubtful and improbable. The assignment alleges a debt of about $16,000. The evidence shows only that the appellants paid $2,900 for the assignor, three or four years before, and that they became his surety for $1,200 more at the time of the assignment. These, and many other circumstances, give good reason to doubt the integrity of the transaction.

The objections to the form of the bill, and to the answer of the three first-men- 278 tioned claimants, cannot be sustained. (1) The only consequences of not offering in the bill to bring the money into court were, that the parties interpleaded might have moved the court to order the complainants to pay it into court; or, perhaps, they might have demurred. They have done neither, and they are now too late with their objection. (2) The same answer is applicable to the objection for want of an affidavit that the bill was exhibited without fraud or collusion. They might have demurred, but they have not done so. (3) As to the omission of the answer (except that of the appellants) to pray for a decree other than their dismissal with costs; this is the common form prescribed by the books of practice, and will sustain a decree for the defendants other than a decree of dismissal with costs. And even though the objection were, in general, well founded, it could not affect this decree, if it can be sustained on the merits; because, as to the appellants, they can only be satisfied after payment of Lindsay, and of Gray & Pindar; and as to Haslett's claim, after the others are satisfied, his attachment will bind the surplus.

Mr. Webster, for the appellants, in reply, argued that in this form of suit, being a bill of interpleader, even if S. Spring & Sons made out no title, it did not follow that the decree must be affirmed. For aught that appeared, the right party might not yet be before the court. The personal representatives of Dearborne may be necessary parties. Every distinct claim stands on its own 279 merits; and even if Spring & Sons are not entitled, the fund cannot be decreed to others, unless they prove themselves to be entitled.

There are two questions: (1) Can the decree, so far as it allows Lindsay's and Gray & Pindar's claims, be maintained? (2) Can their claims be preferred to those of Spring & Sons?

And first, as to Lindsay's claim. So far as it is founded on the attachment suit, it cannot be supported. The judgment against Dearborne, who was dead at the time, is a mere nullity. Besides, the property in the fund had actually been transferred to Spring & Sons before the attachment was laid. If there was a previous lien, the party does not stand in need of the judgment. If there was not, the property was vested in others by the assignment, and the judgment came too late. But he could have acquired no such lien as that which is now set up. There is no rule of law which declares that if a creditor gets, by any means whatsoever, possession of the effects of his debtor, he has thereby a lien as of course. There is here no proof of an actual pledge; and a general lien he cannot have, because, although a broker has a lien for his general balance, on account of policy brokerage, it does not extend to other brokerage. The case cited from 5 Taunton is decisive to this point. If it be said that he is not a broker, then the case is so much stronger against him, for he can have no brokerage balance for which to retain. Besides, he having once parted with 280*] the possession of the policy, *without insisting on his lien, it does not revive by returning to his possession again.

As to Gray & Pindar's claim. It rests on two grounds. (1) A general lien. (2) A special agreement. But how can they claim a general lien? They are not insurance brokers. In order to make out a lien, they must show some course of trade, and some dealing and relation between the parties, to authorize it; a debt, and a liability are not alone sufficient. It is said they had a lien, because they have never been divested of possession. But possession does not create a lien. There must be a right to claim. The assignment operated on the policy in the hands of Gray & Pindar, just as if there had been an actual delivery to the assignees. A lien cannot exist by the party merely having the legal control. That control must be coupled with an interest in the thing. A trustee cannot set up a lien for debts generally, merely because the estate stands in his name.

But, even supposing Gray & Pindar once had such a lien, it was defeated by the award that the policy should be given up by them to the order of Dearborne. The award here pleaded is perfectly good on the face of it; it is completely binding on the parties and cannot be in in this way impeached. A party cannot claim, in equity, against an award, without impeaching it by bill.<sup>1</sup> There is here no proof of partiality, or corruption, or excess of power; and nothing 281*] else will, in equity, *set aside an award.<sup>2</sup> It is said the award does not bind, because the arbitrators did not award an indemnity; and to support this position, a case is cited where they would not act at all on the claim. That case is not this. There is no evidence that Gray & Pindar ever made any claim for indemnity before the arbitrators; and if they did, for aught that appears, it was rightly refused. The award, then, is clearly a bar to any claim existing before the time of the award. If there was any express agreement for a lien before the award, it is merged in the award; and there is no evidence of any such agreement subsequently made.

As to Harford's order, we do not object to its introduction in point of form, but of substance. It is not proved; and if proved, it is a mere nullity. Harford signs it as attorney to Dearborne, who was then dead, and of Spring & Sons, whose attorney he never was. He never was even Dearborne's agent for any other purpose than to transmit the policy to his wife.

As to the assignment to Spring & Sons, it is established by the decree, and that part of the decree is not appealed from. Spring & Sons have appealed, on account of the preference given to Lindsay, and Gray & Pindar; but they have a right to stand on that part of the decree which declares the assignment to be well proved and valid. But the execution of the assignment is *sufficiently proved by the [282 evidence. It is a clear case for admitting secondary evidence.

Mr. Justice LIVINGSTON delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

In reviewing these proceedings the first question necessary to decide is, to whom the policy mentioned in the complainant's bill, belonged at the time of commencing the action on it. It does not appear that the names of the parties interested in the Abigail Ann were disclosed to the company at the time of applying for insurance, or that their names were inserted in the policy. There is, however, no doubt that when it was effected, Gray & Pindar, and John H. Dearborne, were the owners; but in what proportions does not appear, nor is it material now to be known, for whatever interest was held by Gray & Pindar was regularly transferred to Dearborne, by their bill of sale, dated the 27th of May, 1811. This bill of sale is for the whole ship, and its consideration is $5,000. Some time after, in the same year, Gray & Pindar delivered to Henry Harford, as agent of Dearborne, the policy of insurance which had been made on it. Dearborne being thus sole proprietor of the Abigail Ann and policy, on the 28th of October, 1811, executed a bill of sale for the vessel, containing an assignment also of the policy, for valuable consideration, to John Spring, of the firm of Seth Spring & Sons. Some objections were made to the proof of the execution of the instrument, but *they [283 were not listened to below, nor are they regarded as well founded by this court. The proof was such as is required where a party to a deed and the subscribing witness are both dead. The handwriting of both was proved, and Maria Teubner, who testified to that of the witness, left no reasonable ground to doubt of his death. She was a creditor of this witness, and had taken some pains to obtain information where he was, but without success; her last account of him was that he had entered on board an American privateer and had not been heard of for four years. The credit of this witness, although the subject of some animadversion, is not impeached by any testimony in the cause, or by anything which she herself has testified. It follows, then, that on the 28th of October, 1811, Seth Spring & Sons became proprietors of the ship Abigail Ann, and of the policy mentioned in these pleadings, and prima facie entitled to the whole of the moneys recovered on it, although the policy itself was not, at the time, put into their hands. Our next inquiry will be, whether any of the other parties, who are now before us, have a lien on it, or any other title to these moneys, or to any part of them.

The claim of Haslett may be considered as out of the question—it having been postponed by the Circuit Court to that of the appellants, and there being no appeal from this part of the decree.

Lindsay's demand will first be examined. This is made up of the premium paid for effecting the insurance—of an indemnity claimed by him for *indorsing two bills of ex- [284 change for Dearborne, amounting to £400

sterling, and for having become his bail—of the customary commissions for his trouble and attention in conducting the suit against the underwriters, and of the amount of a judgment which he obtained on the 19th of April, 1813, against Dearborne, on an attachment issued out of the Common Pleas for the District of Charleston, and which had been served on the complainants. This attachment was sued out on the 24th of February, 1812.

No evidence is perceived in the proceedings in support of any one of these claims, except that which is founded on the judgment in the attachment. In his answer, Lindsay says that the policy was effected on his application, but nowhere pretends or alleges that he paid the premium for insuring the Abigail Ann, nor is there any proof aliunde of this fact. On the contrary, Gray & Pindar, in their answer, expressly state that it was paid by them, and was probably allowed in their account against Dearborne, in making up the award hereinafter mentioned. Haslett, in his answer, asserts that it was advanced by him. Now, although the answer of one defendant be no evidence against another, yet, in the absence of all proof to the contrary, and where a party observes a profound silence on a subject to which his attention could not but be excited, such answer, not varying from any allegation on his part, furnishes some evidence that he could not make the assertion, because the fact was, in reality, otherwise.

285*] *If this fact of the payment of the premium had been made out, the court would have been disposed to award Mr. Lindsay payment out of the proceeds of the policy, for although he had once parted with it, yet, coming to his hands again, to be put in suit, his lien for the premium would revive and be protected, unless the manner of his parting with it had manifested an intention in him altogether to abandon such lien. His claim for a commission for conducting the suit against the underwriters is inadmissible, it appearing from the testimony of Harford, who transmitted the policy to him, and who is the only witness on this subject, that he has no right to make any such charge. Harford considers himself entitled to this commission, and has accordingly charged it to Dearborne, in an account annexed to his deposition. Now, as this is the witness on whom all the defendants, except Seth Spring & Sons, principally rely, they cannot complain if his testimony, when unfavorable, is allowed its full operation against them. It is evident, then, from the declaration of this witness, that he considered himself as the merchant who was prosecuting the suit, and that Mr. Lindsay was only employed to deliver the policy to a professional gentleman to bring the action. There is another obstacle in the way of this claim, which is, that Lindsay, in the business of this suit, acted, as Harford himself says, as his (Harford's) agent. Now, there is not only no evidence of Harford himself being authorized by the owners of this policy to bring any action on it, but it appears that his detention of it was a 286*] violation of duty, *and that the action he brought was more to answer his own purposes and those of the other defendants than to advance the interest of those whom he knew at the time to be assignees of the policy. In this state of things, nothing would be more unjust than to permit this fund to be encumbered, as against Seth Spring & Sons, with the heavy charge of five per centum, in favor of any one of the parties, who, throughout the whole business, have had in view exclusively their own interest, and were acting in open hostility to those from whom they now demand this compensation. With what propriety can they now claim a commission from these gentlemen, when it is entirely or principally owing to their interference, that they have not to this day received any benefit from a judgment which was recovered for their use nearly eight years ago?

Lindsay's claim to receive any part of this fund, on account of the two bills of exchange for £200 each, is equally unfounded. That he would have had a lien on the policy for this transaction, without an express contract (and none appears), even if he had never parted with its possession, is a proposition which may well be controverted; but if such lien ever existed (which is not asserted), it is not like that for the premium advanced for an insurance; the latter may well revive, in some cases, on a broker's being restored to the possession of a policy, which had once been out of his hands; it being no more than reasonable that whoever acquires an interest in it should generally take it, subject to such a charge. It <sup>*does</sup> 287 not, however, follow that liens which may once have existed for other advances, or on other accounts, whether by agreement of the parties, or by the operation of usage or of law, should be placed on the same favored footing. If, while a policy is out of the hands of the insurance broker, as was the case here, it is assigned for valuable consideration and bona fide, it would be unjust, on its returning to his possession, to revive encumbrances of which the assignee could have had no notice, nor no certain means of finding out; for he could not reasonably suspect that such liens had ever existed in favor of one who had parted with the possession of the only thing by which they could have been enforced. Nor can it make any difference whether the policy have been actually delivered to the assignee, provided the transfer were bona fide made, while out of the possession and power of the insurance broker. Upon the same principle it is that a consignor loses his right to stop goods in transitu, although the consignee have become insolvent, after such consignee, having power to sell, has disposed of them, before their arrival, to a third person unacquainted with any circumstance to taint the fairness of the transaction.

The next charge which Lindsay attempts to fix upon this fund, is an indemnification for becoming bail for Dearborne. Now, if a responsibility, so contingent and remote as one of this nature, could by any possibility, without a very positive and express agreement, be turned into a lien on a policy of insurance, it does not appear in what suits he <sup>*has</sup> thus be- 288 come bail, nor whether he has not been released by the death of the principal of all liability; and of course any demand arising from such responsibility, if any ever existed, must be laid out of the question. And the answer which has already been given to his claim for indorsing certain bills of exchange will also apply here.

The judgment obtained in the attachment suit may be as easily disposed of. It is quite unnecessary to inquire whether these proceedings abated by the death of Dearborne, if he were dead at the time; for at the time of issuing the attachment, and of course long before judgment, Dearborne ceased to have any interest in this policy, the same having been already assigned to John Spring, of the firm of Seth Spring & Sons. No attachment, therefore, against Dearborne, although served on the company, could render the property of another liable for his debts. The attachment of Lindsay, it may incidentally be observed, furnishes some proof that he had no great confidence in the liens which he now asserts against this policy.

The title of Gray & Pindar remains to be examined. By their answer they claim five hundred and two dollars, as the premium paid for insurance on the Abigail Ann, and fifty dollars, paid as a commission for effecting the same. They likewise state that large advances were made by them, between the 5th of April and 7th of August, 1811, on account of the said ship, her cargo, pilotage and repairs; and they also, it seems, became the bail of Dearborne in 289 two several actions, amounting to one thousand dollars, which they have since become liable to pay; they were also indorsers of the two bills of exchange which were indorsed by Lindsay. After stating all these demands, they say that upon closing the account between Dearborne and themselves, there was a balance in their favor of $1,430.16, for which Dearborne gave them a bill of exchange on Logan, Lenon & Co., of Liverpool; that feeling uneasy and insecure from the responsibility resting on them, and aware that they could be indemnified only by a specific lien, they would not deliver to Dearborne the policy, but put it for safe keeping into the hands of their friend, Henry Harford, for the express and avowed purpose of protecting them against all losses on the accounts aforesaid; the said policy being also intended as a security for certain debts due by Dearborne to Harford. Now, without looking any further than the answer of these gentlemen, it is most manifest that none of the demands or responsibilities which are stated in it, were contracted or entered into under any agreement or understanding with Dearborne himself, as Harford would have us believe, that they should be secured by a lien on this policy, but that such lien is set up solely on the ground of a subsequent understanding between them and Harford, to whom it was delivered, for the purpose of protecting them against loss. To derive any benefit from such a delivery, or such an assent on the part of Harford, it should appear (which is not the case) that they had a right to exact, and Harford a right to accept, 290 of the policy on these terms. Unfortunately for these gentlemen, the testimony of their friend and witness, Mr. Harford, most incontestably establishes that they were bound by the decision of persons of their own choice, of whom Harford himself was one, to deliver the policy, without annexing to such an act any condition or terms whatever; and also that the authority of Harford extended only to its receipt and transmission to Mrs. Dearborne, the wife of Mr. John H. Dearborne. On the 21st of September, 1811, which is subsequent to all their advances, indorsements, and engagements for John H. Dearborne, he and Gray & Pindar submitted all their controversies to two arbitrators, who, in conjunction with Harford, as umpire, awarded that Gray & Pindar should pay to Dearborne $66.77, and surrender to him the policy on the Abigail Ann, without unnecessary delay. Now, this award could not have been signed by Harford, if he knew of any lien to which Gray & Pindar were entitled on this policy. It was said that no notice could be taken of this award; but coming, as it does, from a witness of the party, who was himself umpire, and not being impeached, this court cannot without injustice, shut its eyes upon it. If a bill for its specific performance might have been entertained, which was not denied, what higher or better evidence can the court have of the rights of the respective parties, at the time of the transactions referred to in the answer of Gray & Pindar? If judges of their own selection have directed them, as they had a right to do, to surrender this policy without 291 delay, and unconditionally, to Dearborne, this court must now presume (and it is a presumption with which neither Gray & Pindar, nor Harford, can be justly offended) that the policy was delivered to the latter, pursuant to the award; and if not, that any condition with which they thought proper to accompany such delivery, if not a breach of the arbitration bond would at least be a trespass on good faith; and that no assent or understanding on the part of Harford, who was without authority for this purpose, could confer any validity, or give any sanction to such an act. This award is also of importance, to show how entirely mistaken Gray & Pindar are in supposing Dearborne, at the time they speak of, so largely in their debt, when it appears by this instrument that the balance, although not a large one, was in his favor.

As to Harford's power, it appears, from his own letters, that he had no other authority than to transmit the policy, when received, to the family of Dearborne. Accordingly, in a letter to Seth Spring & Sons, of the 26th of September, 1811, he transmits, for Mrs. Dearborne, the bill of sale for the Abigail Ann. And in another letter of the 3d of November following, to the same gentlemen, he apologizes for not sending on the policy, as it had not yet been received from Charleston. After this unequivocal evidence of what was his authority over this policy, it becomes quite unimportant to inquire what agreements he may have made, or what orders he gave Lindsay respecting the proceeds of it. It is not too much to say, that 292 the one of the 13th of May, 1813, in favor of Haslett, by which the whole proceeds, after Lindsay's retaining for himself his legal claim and expenses, was a palpable violation of duty, or breach of instruction, towards Dearborne; and it was properly said by the Circuit Court, "that to vest any interest, hostile to that of Seth Spring & Sons, was certainly not in his power." Gray & Pindar having been originally interested in this ship and policy, on which there was some reliance by their counsel, places them, as it regards a lien, in a condition less favorable than if such ownership had never existed; for by such overt acts, as the execution of a bill of sale of the vessel, and a delivery of the policy, pursuant to the award, to the agent of Dearborne, they have done all in their power to inform the world that they had no claim on either for any demands against Dearborne.

There is error, also, in that part of the decree which directs Seth Spring & Sons to account for their claims on Dearborne. The complainants have no right to an account; and the defendants being called here only to interplead, and having failed to establish any claim on this fund, have as little right to such an account. They cannot, at any rate, require it in the position in which they now stand as co-defendants with Seth Spring & Sons. It is but justice to remark, that for aught that appears in the present suit, there is no reason to suspect the integrity of the assignment to Seth Spring & Sons; they appear to be respectable merchants, and to have been large creditors of 293* Dearborne. It is the opinion of this court, that the decree of the Circuit Court be reversed, so far as it postponed the demand of the appellants to those of Lindsay and of Gray & Pindar, and directed them to account; and that instead thereof, a decree must be entered in their favor for the whole amount recovered on the policy, with interest (the money not having been brought into court) at the rate of six per cent. per annum, from the time of rendering the judgment, the complainants deducting therefrom their costs of suit. The defendants must pay their own costs.

DECREE.—This cause coming on to be heard, and being argued by counsel of the respective parties: It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the decree of the Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina, in this case be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled; and this court, proceeding to pass such decree as the said Circuit Court for the District of South Carolina should have passed, doth further order and decree that the complainants pay to the defendant, John Spring, of the firm of Seth Spring & Sons, the whole amount of the judgment recovered against them on the policy on the ship Abigail Ann, mentioned in the pleadings in this cause, with interest, at the rate of six per centum per annum, from the time of rendering such judgment, after deducting therefrom their costs of suit, to be taxed.

And it is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the defendants in the said Circuit Court, respectively, pay their own costs.

v.

THE UNION INSURANCE COMPANY OF BALTIMORE.

Insurance for $18,000 on vessel valued at that sum, and $2,000 on freight valued at $12,000, on the ship Henry, "at and from Teneriffe, and at and from thence to New York, with liberty to stop at Matanzas; the property warranted American." The policy was executed in 1807; and in the same year another policy was made, by the same underwriters, on freight for the same voyage, to the amount of $10,000, and the property was also warranted American, but there was no liberty to stop at Matanzas. The following representation was made to the underwriters on the part of the plaintiff, who was both owner and master of the ship: "We are to clear out for New Orleans, the property will be under cover of Mr. John Paul, of Baltimore, who goes supercargo on board, yet Mr. Paul will only have part of the cargo to his consignment. There will be three other persons on board that will have the remainder of the cargo in their care. We are to stop at the Matanzas, to know if there are any men-of-war off the Havanna." The vessel sailed from Teneriffe on the 17th of April, 1807, with a cargo belonging to Spanish subjects, but appearing to be the property of John Paul Dumeste, a citizen of the United States, and the same person called John Paul in the representation. The cargo was shipped under a charter-party executed by the plaintiff and Dumeste, representing New Orleans as the place of destination. The ship arrived at the Havanna on the 7th of July, having put into Matanzas to avoid British cruisers, and unladed the cargo, which was there received by the Spanish owners, and the freight, amounting to $7,000, paid to the plaintiff, who received it, "in full of all demands, for freight or otherwise, under or by virtue of the aforesaid charter-party and cargo." At the Havanna the ship took in a new cargo, belonging to merchants in New York, and was lost, with the greater part of the cargo, on the voyage from Havanna to New York. An action of debt was brought on the first policy for the value of the ship and freight. The sum demanded in the writ was $20,000, but the plaintiff limited his demand at the trial to [*295] $18,000 on the ship, and $420 for the freight actually earned on the voyage from Havanna to New York. Held, that he was entitled to recover.

In debt, a less sum may be recovered than that demanded in the writ, where an entire sum is demanded, and it is shown by the counts to consist of several distinct accounts, or where the precise sum demanded is diminished by extrinsic circumstances.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Maryland.

This was an action of debt, upon a policy of insurance, in the usual form, dated on the 27th of May, 1807, on the ship Henry, "lost or not lost," "at and from Teneriffe to Havanna, and at and from thence to New York, with liberty to stop at Matanzas." Eighteen thousand dollars were insured on the ship, valued at that sum, and two thousand dollars on the freight, valued at twelve thousand dollars; and the property was warranted American.

On the 1st of June, in the same year, a policy was executed on the freight of the ship Henry, by the same company, for the same voyage, to the amount of $10,000; the whole freight being valued at $12,000. In this policy also, the property was warranted American; but there was no liberty to stop or touch at Matanzas, or any other place.

Both these policies were effected under an order for insurance, by Henry Thompson, of Baltimore, as agent for the plaintiff, an American citizen, who was master for the voyage, as well as owner. The order bears date on the 18th of May, 1807, and is in the following words:

*"BALTIMORE, May 18th, 1807. [*296

"GENTLEMEN:

"Insurance is wanted on $18,000, on the American ship Henry, Capt. Henry Hughes, and $12,000 on her freight, each valued at the same; at and from Teneriffe to Havanna, and at and from thence to New York, against all risks.

"The Henry was expected to sail on or about the 12th ult.; she is a remarkably good vessel, about 270 tons burthen, and now on her first voyage. Said ship and freight are the sole property of Capt. Hughes, who gives the following particulars in his letter of instructions to N. Talcott, of New York.

"We are to clear out for New Orleans; the property will be under cover of Mr. John Paul, of Baltimore, who goes supercargo on board, yet Mr. Paul will only have part of the cargo to his consignment. There will be three other persons on board that will have the remainder of the cargo in their care. We are to stop at the Matanzas, to know if there are any men-of-war off the Havana.

"When you make insurance, which I expect will be done low, you will state the whole of this business, so that there will be a right understanding of the voyage."

"At what premium will you insure the above risks?"

(Signed) HENRY THOMPSON."

The Henry sailed from Teneriffe on the 17th of April, 1807, with a cargo for the Havana, 297* which belonged to Spaniards, but appeared as the property of John Paul Dumeste, (the person mentioned in the order for insurance by the name of John Paul), a citizen of the United States, who went as supercargo. She took a clearance for New Orleans. This cargo was laden at Teneriffe, under a charter party, which bore date the 10th of March, 1807, and represents New Orleans as the port of destination, without any mention or notice of the Havana. The parties to it were Dumeste, and Henry Hughes, the master. The freight mentioned was $11,000; of which it was stipulated that $5,000 should be paid at New Orleans, and the remaing $6,000 at New York.

The ship proceeded to the Havanna, where she arrived on the 7th of July, having put into Matanzas on the 2d of June, to avoid British cruisers then in sight, and unladed the cargo, which was there delivered to the real Spanish owners. The real freight to the Havanna, amounting to $7,000, was paid at Matanzas to the plaintiff, who received it "in full of all demands for freight or otherwise, under or by virtue of the aforesaid charter-party and cargo." It was proved that this unlading did not produce any additional delay or increase of risk; for the ship left Matanzas and proceeded to Havanna in ballast, as soon as there was any reasonable prospect of escaping the cruisers stationed in the way, and was enabled to proceed sooner and more safely, by being in ballast, which put it in her power to keep closer in shore. At the Havanna she took in a new car- 298* go, belonging to persons in New York, and consisting of 120 boxes of sugar, at a freight of $3.50 the box. On the voyage she sprung a leak, soon after which she transhipped a part of her cargo, consisting of 60 boxes, into the Rising Sun, a vessel bound to Norfolk, where the property was safely landed. Within about two days after the transhipment, the Henry sunk and was totally lost, with the rest of the cargo. The master and crew escaped in their boat. In attempting to make their way to New York, they were taken up at sea in an almost desperate situation.

The freight was abandoned to the underwriters, and a demand was made of payment for Wheat. 8.

that and the ship; which being refused, this action was brought to recover both. The sum demanded by the writ and declaration was $20,000, and the loss declared on was by the dangers of the seas, one of the perils mentioned in the policy. On the plea of nil debet, issue was joined, and the case went to trial.

At the trial, the plaintiff gave the charter-party in evidence, as one of the documents necessary or proper for establishing the neutral character of the vessel and freight; but there was no evidence of its having been at any time produced or mentioned to the defendants, or in any manner known to them. He also proved his own national character, and that of the ship, his interest in the ship and freight, the commencement and prosecution of the voyage, and the loss and abandonment. By an admission at the bar he expressly limited his demand of freight to that earned on the 120 boxes of *sugar, amounting to $420; and renounc- *299 ed all claim to any further or other sum on that account.

The defendants then gave in evidence the separate policy on the freight, which is mentioned above; and also produced evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, in his management respecting the said ship, after the leak was discovered, was guilty of gross negligence, in not using such means as were in his power for conducting the said ship into a place of safety in the Delaware; and that he might have conducted her into a place of safety there, had he used those means.

The plaintiff then gave evidence of the causes, nature and duration of the delay at the Matanzas, as stated above, and of the effect produced on the risk by unlading the cargo there. He also gave in evidence that after the said leak was discovered, the plaintiff did all in his power, according to his skill and ability, to save the said ship, and to conduct her safely to her port of destination; and that there was no place of safety in the Delaware to which the said ship could have been conducted, nearer, or more easily reached, in the state of the wind and weather at that time, than New York.

The defendants then prayed the opinion of the court, and their direction to the jury:

1. That if the jury should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the cargo shipped at Teneriffe, which the order for insurance of the 18th of May, 1807, mentions, and which the charter-party, and the policy of insurance upon freight of the 1st of June, 1807, read in evidence on this trial, also *mentions, was [*300 landed, and finally separated from the ship at Matanzas, and was there delivered by the plaintiff, at the instance of the freighters, and accepted by the freighters, the plaintiff receiving from the said freighters $7,000 in lieu of all demands upon the said charter-party, including the whole freight to the Havanna; and that a cargo of sugar, for an entirely new account and risk, to wit, for the account and risk of Le Roy, Bayard & M'Evors, of New York, was, by the plaintiff, taken in at the Havanna, with which the ship sailed upon her voyage to New York, as proved by the plaintiff's testimony, then the plaintiff is not entitled to a verdict for any freight, upon the issue and pleadings in this cause.

2. That if the jury should find, from the plaintiff's declaration and the evidence, that the cargo shipped at Teneriffe, which the order for insurance of the 18th of May, 1807, mentions, and which the charter-party, and the policy of insurance upon freight of the 1st of June, 1807, read in evidence on this trial, also mention, was landed, and finally separated from the ship, at the Matanzas, by the freighters and the plaintiff, and was there delivered by the plaintiff, and accepted by the freighters, and their contract of freightment abandoned, the plaintiff receiving from the said freighters the sum of $7,000, in lieu of all demands upon the said charter-party, including the whole freight to the Havanna; and that a cargo for an entirely new account and risk, to wit, for the account and risk of Le Roy, Bayard & McEvers, of New York, was, by the plaintiff, 301*] taken in at the Havanna, *with which the ship sailed to New York, as proved by the plaintiff's testimony; and further, that in the course of her said voyage to New York, a part of the said cargo was transhipped into the Rising Sun, as stated in the plaintiff's evidence; and if they also find, that the risk was increased by taking in the new cargo aforesaid, and the transhipment aforesaid, beyond what it would have been had the said ship proceeded in ballast from the Havanna to New York, then the policy was wholly discharged, and the plaintiff cannot recover as to the vessel, on the issue and proceedings in this case.

3. That if the jury should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the plaintiff had an opportunity of causing the said ship, after the discovery of the leak, to be carried into the Delaware, or elsewhere, and there saved from the total loss which afterwards happened, and that he did not act with proper and reasonable care, in forbearing to do so, he is not entitled to recover in this action.

These directions were given by the court, who further instructed the jury that this was a valued policy, on which an action of debt lies; the sum claimed being specified by an agreement of the parties. But the whole must be recovered, or no part of it can be recovered. In this suit, the action is for two distinct sums, $18,000 on the ship, and $2,000 on the freight. The party can recover either entire, and not the other; but not a portion of either, without accounting for the residue.

To these opinions and directions, the plaintiff 302*] took a bill of exceptions, on which, judgment was rendered for the defendants, and the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Mr. Harper, for the plaintiff, made the following points:

1. That there was no connection whatever between the policy and the charter-party, which, not having been made known to the underwriters, can make no part of the contract, nor in any manner affect it.

2. That the policy on the freight alone, however it might have been affected by the payment at the Havanna, had an action been brought on it, cannot affect the present case, the policy in which expressly declares that the whole freight on the whole voyage insured should be valued at $12,000, of which only $2,000 were to be covered by that policy; a declaration entirely conformable to the order on which both policies were made.

3. That the receipt of $7,000 at the Havanna, if it had been in full of all claims under the charter-party, could not affect the plaintiff's claim in this case; because the policy has no connection with the charter-party, and the freight now claimed arose on a voyage entirely different from the one described in that instrument.

4. That the receipt of the $7,000 at the Havanna was not in full satisfaction of all claims and rights under the charter-party; but merely "in full of all demands for freight or otherwise, under or by virtue of the aforesaid charter-party and cargo;" that is, in full payment of the freight *due, under the [303 charter-party or otherwise, on the cargo brought from Teneriffe, and landed at Matanzas.

5. That although the action brought is debt, and the sum declared for on account of freight is $2,000, yet less may be recovered in such a case as the present; where the right to recover depends not on the contract alone, but on matter dehors and independent.<sup>1</sup>

6. And consequently, that the first direction was wrong, and also the third, which applies to the form of the action; a point equally open under the first application.

And as to the second instruction:

1. That for the true construction and character of this contract, we are to look to the policy alone, or at most to that and the order for insurance. The charter-party not being referred to in the order, or in any manner made known to the defendants, cannot be taken into view.

2. That the policy and the order make two distinct voyages, or one voyage divided into two distinct parts; so that, at the termination of the first voyage, or of the first section, the first cargo might be discharged, and a new one taken in for the second section.

3. That the plaintiff thus having a right to take in a new cargo at the Havanna, for the residue of the voyage, it was his duty to use all proper means for the preservation of that cargo; and consequently, *no delay, deviation [304 or increase of risk, arising from the use of such means, can affect his claim on the underwriters on the ship.

4. And consequently, that the second direction also was erroneous.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, contra, argued, that the insurance was altogether restricted to the voyage mentioned and stipulated in the charter-party, and that the voluntary surrender of that contract at the Matanzas, annihilated the contract of insurance on the freight. That the receipt of a compensation by way of compromise for the freight, as stipulated, on the voyage from the Havanna to New York, was, in fact, the receipt of the whole freight for that voyage. And that taking in a cargo at the Havanna, not provided for by the charter-party, or mentioned in the representation to the underwriters, terminated the insurance on the vessel, and discharged the underwriters altogether.<sup>2</sup> He also insisted that the direction of the court, as to the form of action, was correct.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted on a policy of insurance on the ship Henry, and on the freight to be earned by her, on a voyage from Teneriffe to Havanna, and thence to New York. Eighteen thousand dollars on the ship, and two 305* thousand *dollars on the freight, were insured in this policy; and another sum of ten thousand dollars on the freight, was insured in a distinct policy by the same company. At the trial, the defendants prayed certain instructions to the jury, which the court gave, and added a further instruction in their favor, in pursuance of which the jury found for the defendants below. The question is, whether the instructions so given were conformable to the law of the case.

This must depend upon the construction of the policy, as modified by the representations made at the time of the contract.

The vessel, it appears, was at Teneriffe when the order for insurance was written, and had engaged in the transportation of Spanish property, to be covered as American, in the manner specified in the representation. By the charter-party, John Paul Dumeste appears as the owner and affreighter of the goods, and the voyage stipulated for is precisely that insured against, to wit, from Teneriffe to Havanna (under the disguise of New Orleans), with liberty to put into Matanzas, and from Havanna to New York. There is no imputation of unfairness; the nature of the voyage was distinctly understood between the parties; and the only question which goes to the negation of the right of recovery of freight altogether, is raised upon the supposed termination of the voyage insured against at Matanzas, and the actual receipt there of the whole freight insured. And as against the sum insured on the vessel, the defendants insist that 306* the act of taking in a cargo at *the Havanna, which was not permitted by the contract of insurance, avoided the contract.

The argument is, that the insurance was altogether confined to the voyage stipulated for under the charter-party.

And it has been contended that the voluntary surrender of that contract at the Matanzas put an end to the voyage, or to the adventure insured.

That the receipt of a compensation, by way of compromise, for the $7,000 freight, stipulated for on the voyage from Havanna to New York, was in fact the receipt of the whole freight on that voyage.

And lastly, that taking in a cargo at the Havanna, not in contemplation under the charter-party or representation, put an end to the insurance on the vessel, and discharged the underwriters altogether.

It is obvious that if this case be disposed of upon the contract, as exhibited on the face of the policy, the right of the plaintiff to recover would be unquestionable. The defendants, however, avail themselves of the right of insisting on the contract, such as it really was in the intendment of the parties, whatever the policy might purport on the face of it.

The benefit of the same principle, therefore, cannot be withheld from their adversary; and, accordingly, the existence of a charter-party becomes altogether an immaterial circumstance in the case. No mention of it was made in the representation; and the voyage might have been prosecuted without it. The representation was *the document to which the parties [307 were referred for their respective undertakings. Engaging in a voyage different from that, whether with or without a charter-party, would have vitiated the contract. But a charter-party so strictly conforming to that representation, would only leave the parties where it found them; and answered no other purpose than to furnish the authentic evidence of freight engaged, in case of loss, while sailing under it. And this is the whole effect of the cases cited to sustain this supposed intimate and mutual dependence between policies and charter-parties.

Has, then, the representation been complied with substantially?

This depends upon the real nature of the voyage insured; in considering which, it is obvious that although it was indispensable that the American mantle should be thrown over the cargo, it was by no means so that the cargo should continue to need the protection of that mantle. It would be as reasonable to contend that, if Spain had ceased to be a belligerent, or John Paul Dumeste, instead of being the nominal, had become the real owner of the cargo, the contract of insurance would have been avoided. We consider a representation of property, being covered as American, as substantially complied with if the property be actually American. And as the presence and agency of John Paul Dumeste, had the cloaking of the property as their sole object, that his presence was dispensed with when the cargo became actually American.

So much for the national character of the shipper. And as to his identity, we see nothing in *the contract to prevent the [308 change which took place under the transactions at Matanzas and the Havanna. It is very clear that, provided John Paul Dumeste had continued in the capacity of supposed owner, the representation would have admitted of taking in a cargo from the Havanna, belonging to any other Spanish subjects than the shippers from Teneriffe. The plaintiff, then, was not bound by anything in the representation, to hold the original shippers to their contract, but was left at large, as in all such carrying voyages, to do the best he could for himself in earning freight; provided the cargo still continued covered as American. He was, then, at liberty to change the actual shipper; and he has done nothing more in compounding with the Spanish charterers, and putting his vessel up as a general ship at the Havanna.

But it is contended that by the composition made at the Matanzas, the plaintiff has actually received what he is now suing for, to wit, his freight from Havanna to New York.

Plausible as this argument appears, we are of opinion that the facts will not sustain it. The sum received in composition, to wit, $7,000 (from which, we presume, was deducted both prime and specific compensation, as stipulated for under the charter-party), could not have been for the hire of the vessel to New York. To say nothing of the difference in amount, what interest could the first charterers have had in sending her empty to New York? The true understanding of the arrangement is, that those 309* shippers purchased a release from the obligation to find a cargo for New York, and thus avoided paying the sum of $7,000. The master, then, took the risk of not being able to procure a freight for the last port of his voyage. This was the consideration of the composition paid him, and events proved that he made a hard bargain for himself, and a very beneficial one for the underwriters. Had the vessel taken in full freight from the Havanna for New York, it might have been a question, upon the loss happening, whether the underwriters were entitled to deduct the $7,000 so received; but in the present state of facts, no question can be raised upon it, but that which has been raised, to wit, whether it operated as a receipt in full to the underwriters for all freight that might, by possibility, be engaged on the remaining voyage. We have expressed our opinion that it did not.

1.—The United States v. Colt, 1 Peter's Jr. Rep. 145, and the authorities there cited.

With regard to that part of the instruction which was voluntarily given by the court, it is necessary to remark, that although it does not appear to have been moved by the defendants' counsel, yet it was on a point certainly presented by the case; and as it is one on which this cause may, by possibility, be again brought up to this court, it is proper now to decide it.

So far as relates to the policy on the ship, there can be no difficulty. The plaintiff is entitled to the whole, or nothing. We are of opinion that he was entitled to the whole. But as the plaintiff demands only the sum of $420 for freight from the Havanna, the question arises whether, in this form of action, he could 310* recover less than the $2,000 specified in the contract, and claimed by the writ. On this point the court charged the jury "that the whole must be recovered, or no part of it could be recovered; that the party could recover either of the two sums claimed, entire, without the other, but not a portion of either without accounting for the residue."

On this subject, this court is satisfied that the law of the action of debt is the same now that it has been for centuries past. That the judgment must be responsive to the writ, and must, therefore, either be given for the whole sum demanded, or exhibit the cause why it is given for a less sum. Otherwise non constat, but the difference still remains due. That this is the law where an entire sum is demanded in the writ, and shown by the counts to consist of several distinct debts is established by the case of Andrews v. De la Hay (Hobart, 178); that the law is the same where an entire sum is demanded, and only half of it established, is laid down expressly in the case of Speak v. Richards, in the same book (209, 210), and adjudged in the case of Grobham v. Thornborough (82), and in the more modern case of Ingledeu v. Crips (2 Lord Raym., 814, 816). Our own courts, in several of the states and districts, have also recognized and conformed to the same doctrine.

And the same cases establish that the requisite conformity between the writ and judgment, in the action of debt, may be fully complied with, either by the pleadings, the finding of the jury, or a remitter entered by the *311 plaintiff, either before or after verdict, or even after demurrer.

If, therefore, the instruction to the jury on this point was intended to intimate that they could not find for the plaintiff any less sum than the $2,000 valued on the freight, we deem it exceptionable; inasmuch as the plaintiff had a right to claim a verdict for the freight established by the evidence, and enter a remitter for the difference.<sup>1</sup>

There was another question made by the defendants' counsel, on the argument, which had relation to the quantum of the sum to be recovered for freight under this policy. It was contended that it ought to be reduced by reference to the ratio which it bears to the other policy executed on the same freight. But we decline deciding the point, as well because it is not brought up under the bill of exceptions, as because we cannot discover how it can affect the interests of the parties, since both policies were executed between the same parties upon the same representation.

Judgment reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Circuit *Court of the United States for the Dis- *312 trict of Maryland, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the said Circuit Court erred in the first and second instructions given to the jury, as prayed for by the defendants' counsel, and in the voluntary opinion of said Circuit Court, so far as the said opinion was intended to instruct the jury, that they could not find any less sum than two thousand dollars valued on the freight.

It is therefore adjudged and ordered that the judgment of the said Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, in this case, be, and the same is hereby reversed and annulled; and it is further ordered, that said cause be remanded to said Circuit Court, with instructions to issue a venire facias de novo.

[CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. PRACTICE.]

BUEL v. VAN NESS.

The appellate jurisdiction of this court, under the 25th sec. of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, may be exercised by a writ of error issued by the clerk of a circuit court, under the seal of that court, in the form prescribed by the act of the 8th of May, 1792, c. 137, s. 9; and the writ itself need not state that it is directed to a final judgment of the State Court,

1.—This question respecting the action of debt is so fully discussed and settled in the case of the United States v. Colt, 1 Peters, Jr., Rep. 145, that the editor has taken the liberty of subjoining, in the Appendix to the present volume, Note II., the very able judgment of Mr. Justice Washington in that case.

or that the court is the highest court of law or equity of the state.

The appellate jurisdiction of this Court, in cases brought from the state courts, arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, is not limited by the value of the matter in dispute.

313* Its jurisdiction in such cases extends to a case where both parties claim a right or title under the same act of Congress, and the decision is against the right or title claimed by either party.

Under the 91st section of the duty act of 1799, c. 128, the share of a forfeiture to which the collector, &c., of the district is entitled, is to be paid to the person who was the collector, &c., in office at the time the seizure was made, and not to his successor in office at the time of condemnation and the receipt of the money.

Error to the Supreme Court of Vermont, for the County of Chittenden, being the highest court of law in that state.

The plaintiff in error, Buel, brought an action of assumpsit against the defendant in error, Van Ness, in the State Court. The declaration was for money had and received, and money lent and advanced, to which defendant pleaded the general issue, and upon the trial the jury found the following special verdict:

That for the space of two years preceding the fifteenth day of February, in the year 1813, the said Samuel Buel was collector of the customs for the district of Vermont, having been theretofore duly appointed and commissioned by the President of the United States to that office, and sworn according to law, and taken upon himself the discharge of the duties of the office aforesaid; that during the time the said Buel was collector of the customs aforesaid, a certain quantity of fur and wine was seized in the said district, by one Joshua Peckham, an inspector of the customs within the said district, acting under the authority of the said Buel, as collector as aforesaid, as forfeited to the United States, for having been imported 314* contrary to law; that the said fur and wine, during the time the said Buel was collector as aforesaid, were duly libeled in the District Court of the United States for the District of Vermont; that at the term of said court, in which the said fur and wine were libeled, as aforesaid, one Zehnon Atwood preferred his claim to the said fur and wine, in due form, in the said court, and then and there executed to the said United States, a bond in the sum of $1,202.64, being the value of the said fur and wine, as appraised according to law, and conditioned for the payment of the said sum to the United States, in case the said fur and wine should be condemned; that afterwards, and while the said Buel was collector as aforesaid, to wit, at the term of the said court holden at Rutland, within and for said district, on the tenth day of October, in the year 1812, such proceedings were had on said libel, that the said fur and wine were regularly condemned as forfeited to the United States; that on the said fifteenth day of February, in the year 1813, the said Samuel Buel was, by the President of the United States, removed from the said office of collector for the district of Vermont; that on the same day the said Cornelius P. Van Ness was duly appointed to the said office, and commissioned and sworn accordingly, and still continues to hold said office; that on the tenth day of May, in the year 1813, the said sum of $1,202.64 was paid into court, in discharge of the said bond, into the hands of Jesse Gore, Esq., clerk of the said court; that on the same day the said sum of money was, *by the said Jesse Gore, paid into the [*315 hands of the said Cornelius P. Van Ness, Esq., collector as aforesaid, to be by him distributed according to the laws of the United States; that the said Cornelius P. Van Ness, on the first day of July, in the year last aforesaid, paid into the treasury of the United States one moiety of the said sum of $1,202.64, and that the said Cornelius P. Van Ness retains the remainder of the said sum as belonging to him as collector as aforesaid, and to the inspector who seized the said goods, and to the person who first informed of the said offense, notwithstanding the said Buel, before the commencement of the said action, to wit, on the fifth day of June, in the year 1813, at Burlington aforesaid, did demand the same of the said Van Ness. And if upon the whole matter aforesaid, by the jurors aforesaid, in form aforesaid found, it shall seem to the Court here that the said Cornelius P. Van Ness is liable in law for the non-performance of the promises in said declaration contained, in manner and form as the said Samuel Buel complains against him, then the said jurors further upon their oath say, that the said Cornelius did assume and promise, in manner and form as the said plaintiff, in his said declaration hath alleged, and they assess the damages of him, the said Samuel, by the occasion of the non-performance of the said promises and undertakings, at the sum of $672.47, and find for him to recover the said sum, with his costs; but if upon the whole matters aforesaid, by the jurors aforesaid, in form aforesaid found, *it shall seem to the Court here, that the [*316 said Cornelius P. Van Ness is not liable in law, in manner and form as the said Samuel complains against him, then the jurors aforesaid, upon their oath say, that the said Cornelius P. Van Ness did not assume and promise, in manner and form as the said Samuel hath alleged against him, and find for him to recover his costs.

Upon which, judgment was rendered by the State Court for the defendant; and the cause was brought by writ of error to this Court. The writ of error was issued by the clerk of the Circuit Court of Vermont, under the seal of that court, and in the usual form of writs of error to the judgments of the circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. Sergeant, for the plaintiff, argued, that the judgment of the State Court was erroneous upon the settled decisions of this court. The collector, under whose authority the seizure was made, was clearly entitled to the moiety of the forfeiture given by the collection act of 1799, ch. 122, sec. 89, 91, and not the collector who was in office at the time condemnation was pronounced, and the money actually received.<sup>1</sup>

The Attorney-General, contra, argued, (1) That the writ of error, in this case, was not, upon its face, to a final judgment of the highest court of law of the state. This Court is a court of a *limited and special jurisdiction, [*317 both by the constitution, and by the act of Congress giving it appellate jurisdiction over the state courts in certain cases. All persons who appear before it must bring themselves within the jurisdiction, either by the nature of the controversy, or the character of the parties.<sup>1</sup> The writ of error is the instrument by which the record is to be brought into this Court, and it must, therefore, exhibit on its face, the appellate jurisdiction. (2) The writ does not appear to have emanated from the office of the clerk of this Court, nor from any office authorized to issue it. The writ was issued by the clerk of the Circuit Court of Vermont. The act of May, 1792, ch. 137, sec. 9, directs the clerk of this Court to send to the clerks of the circuit courts the form of a writ of error to be issued by the latter under the seal of the Circuit Court. But this provision cannot apply to writs of error to judgments of the state courts. (3) It is not stated in the writ of error, nor does it appear, that the Supreme Court of the state of Vermont is the highest court of law or equity in the state, in which a decision could be had. Non constat, but there may be another still higher appellate tribunal, where the cause might have been carried. (4) The amount of the judgment is not sufficient to support a writ of error to this Court. The 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, provides that in all cases where this Court has appellate jurisdiction *from the judgments or decrees of the state courts, they may be re-examined on a writ of error "in the same manner, and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a circuit court." One of those regulations is that the matter in dispute must be of the value of $2,000. And the policy of the law, or the supposed intention of the law-makers, cannot give jurisdiction by implication. (5) But if these formal objections should be overruled, he insisted that the decision of the State Court was not against a right claimed under a statute of the United States, within the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20, since both parties claimed the sum of money in controversy under the same act of Congress. If the State Court has committed any error, it is merely in misconstruing an act of Congress, and not in deciding against any right, title, privilege or exemption claimed by the plaintiff under it. The decision is in favor of a party so claiming, and where that is the case, this Court has no jurisdiction.<sup>2</sup> (6) The plaintiff was not entitled to judgment on the special verdict, because the inspector, who appears by it to have acted as seizing officer, must have been entitled by law to a proportion of the forfeiture, and therefore the plaintiff could not have been entitled to the whole amount found by the jury. 319* Mr. Sergeant, in reply, insisted, that it sufficiently appeared upon the record that the judgment was final. The word judgment implies that it was final, unless something appears to the contrary. The Supreme Court of Vermont is, in point of fact, the highest court of law or equity of that state. This Court cannot compel a state court to represent itself as the highest court. It appears so to be by the state constitution and laws. They are not foreign laws, and this Court is bound to take notice of them. They are expressly made rules of decision in the national courts, by the judiciary act. As to the amount in controversy, it is immaterial. The object of the provision was to produce perfect uniformity in the decisions upon the laws, treaties, and constitution of the Union. It stands upon different grounds from that where the character of the parties alone gives jurisdiction. There the sole object was to secure impartial tribunals, in controversies between citizens of different states, and between aliens and citizens. The case is within the very letter of the act. It does not appear how the defendant claimed. It appears that the plaintiff claimed under a statute of Congress. The decision was against his claim, and that is sufficient. To determine otherwise, would be to defeat the whole object of the provision, which was intended to secure uniformity in the construction of the statutes of Congress throughout the Union.

This suit was instituted by the plaintiff in *error, late collector of the district [*320 of Vermont, against the collector, his successor in office. The sum sued for is one-half the proceeds of a seizure made while Buel was in office, but not recovered until after he was superseded by the defendant.

The right of Buel to the sum sued for is not now to be questioned. It has already obtained the sanction of this Court. (Jones v. Shore, 1 Wheat. Rep., 462.) But before the question was agitated here, a decision had already taken place in the State Court in favor of Van Ness, and the cause being now brought up under the 25th section of the judiciary act, a number of exceptions have been taken to the plaintiff's right of recovery, which have no bearing whatever upon the right of action.

The first of the points made by the defendant's counsel is, "that the writ of error does not, upon its face, purport to be issued upon a final judgment of the highest court in the state.

We see no reason why it should be so expressed. The writ of error is the act of the court; its object is to cite the parties to this court, and to bring up the record. How else is this court to ascertain whether the judgment be final? Nor can there be any danger of its being hastily or erroneously used, since it must be allowed either by the presiding judge of the State Court, or a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States.

2d. "That the writ does not appear to have emanated from the office of the Supreme Court, nor from any office authorized to issue it."

*This is answered by reference to the [*321 seal on the face of the writ, which appears to be that of the Circuit Court of Vermont, and the signature of the clerk. A form of a writ of error has been designed by the judges of this Court, and transmitted to the clerks of the respective circuits, by the clerk of this Court, according to law. And this writ has duly issued from the Circuit Court, after being allowed by the circuit judge. What more does the law require? (See s. 8, act of May 8th, 1792.)

2.—Gordon v. Caldeleugh, 3 Cranch's Rep. 268; Matthews v. Zane, 4 Cranch's Rep. 382.

3. It is objected, "That it is not stated, nor does it appear, that the Supreme Court of the state of Vermont is the highest court in the state in which a decision in the suit could be had, and therefore the jurisdiction of this Court is not shown."

Nor was it necessary, at this stage of the proceedings, that it should have been shown. It has been before observed, that this writ is the act of the court, and if it has issued improvidently, the question is open on a motion to quash it. No one is precluded by the emanation of the writ; and the right of the party who demands it, ought not to be finally passed upon by a judge at his chambers. It is a writ of common right in the cases to which the jurisdiction of an appellate court extends, and the abuse of it is sufficiently guarded against, as suggested to the first exception.

4. It is contended, "That the amount of the judgment is not sufficient to ground an appeal or writ of error to this Court."

This is a new question. Thirty-four years 322* has *this Court been adjudicating under the 25th section of the act of 1789, and familiarly known to have passed in judgment upon cases of very small amount, without having before had its attention called to the construction of the 25th section now contended for. Nevertheless, if the received construction has been erroneously adopted, without examination, it is not too late to correct it now.

But we think that it is not necessary to sustain our practice upon contemporaneous and long protracted exposition; that as well the words of the two sections under which we exercise appellate jurisdiction, as the reasons and policy on which those clauses were enacted, will sustain the received distinction between the cases to which those sections extend.

The argument on this part of the case is, that the appellate jurisdiction conferred by the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, is restricted within the same limits, as to amount, with that conferred by the 22d section, under the influence of those words which enact, as to the cases comprised within the 25th section, "that they may be re-examined, and reversed, or affirmed, in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, the citation being signed, &c., in the same manner and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered in a circuit court," &c.

The fallacy of the argument consists in attaching too enlarged an application to the meaning of the word "regulation," as here used. It 323* is obvious *from the context, as well as from its ordinary meaning and use, that its proper bearing is altogether confined to the writ of error, citation, &c., to be issued in a case which has been before fully defined, and not that it should itself enter into the descriptive circumstances by which those cases are to be identified, to which the appellate jurisdiction of the court is to be extended. By reference to the 22d section, it will be seen that the sum to which the appellate power is confined in that section is in every case the specific difference by which it is distinguished from every other case; and that the regulations under which the jurisdiction, in those cases, is to be exercised, constitute the subject of the remaining part of that section, and the whole of the 23d, as it does of various other sections scattered through the laws passed upon the same subject.

And this construction is fully supported by reference to the political object of the two sections, as has been forcibly insisted upon by the defendant's counsel. Questions of mere meum and tuum, are those to which the 22d section relates; but those intended to be provided for by the 25th section are noticed only for their national importance, and are deemed proper for an appellate tribunal, from the principles, not the sums, that they involve. Practically, we know that experience has vindicated the foresight of the legislature in making this distinction.

The fifth point submitted by the defendant's counsel is "that the decision of the State Court was not against a right claimed under a statute of *the United States, within the pro- [324visions of the 25th section of the judiciary act; since both parties claimed the money in contest under the same act of congress."

This point we consider as already decided in the case of Matthews v. Zane (4 Cranch's Rep., 382); nor do we feel any difficulty in again deciding that the principle which it asserts cannot be sustained. The simplest mode of meeting the proposition is to negative it in its own terms. The decision of the State Court was "against a right claimed under a statute of the United States." Buel's claim was altogether founded upon a statute of the United States. Nor was he a volunteer in the State Court; for, being a citizen of the same state with the defendant, he could not, under the judiciary act of the United States, come, in the first instance, into the courts of the United States. Had it been otherwise, however, it would seem to be a question of expediency with the legislature, rather than one of construction for a court. The literal meaning of the terms of the 25th section embraces the plaintiff's case; as it would also have embraced that of the defendant, had the State Court decided against his claim under the same act. If the United States have jurisdiction over all causes arising under their own laws, Congress must possess the power of determining to what extent that jurisdiction shall be vested in this court.

The sixth and last point made for the defendant, is that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment on the verdict according to the facts found by the *jury. And under this [325head it is contended "that the inspector, acting as seizing officer, or informer, who appears in the special verdict, must have been entitled by law to a proportion of this forfeiture, and, therefore, the plaintiff could not have been entitled to the whole amount awarded him by the jury in the alternative finding."

It is not now necessary, nor are we in possession of the facts necessary to determine the relative rights of the collector and the supposed informer. If Peckham was entitled in that character to share with this plaintiff, he is not precluded by this decision. He was no party to the action. And if his rights were intended to be set up against this plaintiff, they should have been distinctly found by the jury. Under the finding, as it actually exists, there is no right definitively ascertained but those of the two parties to the suit. The 6th section of the collection law requires no officer to be appointed for the district of Vermont but a collector. The presumption therefore is that he is the only individual entitled to forfeitures in that district until the contrary be shown. The 91st section, which vests the interests on which this suit is sustained, gives the whole to any one of the three distributees of the moiety, when there is but one officer for the district in which the seizure is made.

We are therefore of opinion that the judgment be reversed and a judgment entered for the plaintiff upon the other alternative of the verdict.

326*] [*PROMISSORY NOTE. EVIDENCE.]

NICHOLLS, Plaintiff in Error,
v.

WEBB, Defendant in Error.

No demand of payment, or notice of non-payment, by a notary public, is necessary in the case of promissory notes. A protest is (strictly speaking) evidence in the case of foreign bills of exchange only.

But it is a principle that memorandums made by a person in the ordinary course of his business of acts which his duty, in such business, requires him to do for others, are, in case of his death, admissible evidence of acts so done. A fortiori, the acts of a public officer are so admissible, though they may not be strictly official, if they are according to general usage and the ordinary course of his office.

Therefore, the books of a notary public, proved to have been regularly kept, are admissible in evidence, after his decease, to prove a demand of payment, and notice of non-payment, of a promissory note.

ERROR to the District Court of Louisiana.

This was a suit brought by petition, according to the course of proceedings in Louisiana,<sup>1</sup> by Webb, the defendant in error, against Nicholls, the plaintiff in error, upon a promissory note dated the 15th of January, 1819, made by one Fletcher, for the sum of $4,880, payable to the order of Nicholls, at the Nashville Bank, and indorsed by Nicholls, by his agent, to Webb. The answer of the defendant below denied such a demand and notice of non-payment, as were necessary to render 327*] him liable as indorser. At the trial it appeared in evidence that the note became due on the 18th of July, which was Sunday. The demand of payment of the maker was made and notice of non-payment to the indorser was given at the request of the plaintiff below, by one Washington Perkins, a notary public, who died before the trial. The original protest was annexed to the plaintiff's petition, and was drawn up according to the usual formula of that instrument, stating a demand and refusal of payment at the Nashville Bank, on Saturday, the 17th of July, the 18th being Sunday, and that he, the notary, "duly notified the indorsers of the non-payment." The plaintiff offered this protest, among other evidence, to support his cause, together with the deposition of Sophia Perkins, the daughter of the notary. This witness stated, in her deposition, that her father kept a regular record of his notarial acts, and uniformly entered, in a book kept by himself, or caused the deponent to enter, exact copies of the notes, bills, &c., which he protested; and in the margin opposite to the copy of the protest, made memorandums after notification to indorsers, if any, of the fact of such notification and the manner; and that his notarial records had been, ever since his death, in the house where she lived. And to her deposition she annexed, and verified as true, a copy of the protest in this case. The copy of the protest stated the demand (as supposed by mistake) to have been made on the 19th, instead of the 17th of July, 1819, and contained the following memorandum on the margin: "Indorser duly notified in writing [328 19th of July, 1819, the last day of grace being Sunday, the 18th. Washington Perkins." In other respects the protest was in the same form with that annexed as the original to the plaintiff's petition. The defendant below objected to the admission of this protest and deposition in evidence, but his objection was overruled by the court. Whereupon the defendant excepted, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff; upon which, the court, according to the usual practice in Louisiana, ascertained the sum due, and rendered judgment. The cause was then brought by writ of error to this Court.

This cause was argued by Mr. Eaton and Mr. C. J. Ingersoll<sup>2</sup> for the plaintiff in error, and by Mr. Sergeant<sup>3</sup> for the defendant in error. But as the grounds of argument and the authorities are so fully stated in the opinion of the Court, it has not been thought necessary to report their arguments.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the Court:

This is a writ of error to the District Court of Louisiana. The suit was [329 brought by Mr. Webb, as indorsee, against Mr. Nicholls, as indorser of a promissory note, dated the 15th of January, 1819, and made by Thomas H. Fletcher, for the sum of $4,880, payable to Nicholls or order, at the Nashville Bank, and indorsed by Nicholls, by his agent, to the plaintiff. The note became due on the 18th of July, which being Sunday, the note, of course, was payable on the preceding Saturday. The cause came on for trial upon petition and answer, according to the usual course of proceedings in Louisiana, the answer setting up, among other things, a denial of due demand and notice of non-payment; and upon the trial the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The court, thereupon ascertained the sum due, and entered judgment for the plaintiff according to what is understood to be the usual practice of that state.

Several questions have been argued at the bar which may be at once laid out of the case, since they do not arise upon the record; and we may therefore proceed to examine that alone upon which any judgment was pronounced in the court below.

From the issue in the cause, the burthen of proof of due demand of payment and due notice of the non-payment to Nicholls rested on the plaintiff. It appears that the demand was made and notice given, at the request of the plaintiff, by one Washington Perkins, a notary public, who died before the trial. The original protest was annexed to the plaintiff's 330* petition, and contained the usual language in this instrument, stating a demand and refusal of payment at the Nashville Bank, on the 17th of July, the 18th being Sunday, and that he, the notary, "duly notified the indorsers of the non-payment." Among other evidence to support the plaintiff's case, he offered this protest, together with the deposition of Sophia Perkins, the daughter of the notary. She stated, in her deposition, that her father kept a regular record of his notarial acts, and uniformly entered, in a book kept by himself, or caused the deponent to do it, exact copies of the notes, bills, &c.; and in the margin opposite to the copy of the protest made memorandums after notification to indorsers, if any, of the fact of such notification, and the manner; and that his notarial records had been, ever since his death, in the house where she lived. And to her deposition she annexed and verified as true, a copy of the protest in this case. The copy of the protest states the demand (most probably by mistake) to have been made on the 19th, instead of the 17th of July, 1819, and contains a memorandum on the margin: "Indorser duly notified in writing 19th of July, 1819, the last day of grace being Sunday, the 18th. Washington Perkins." In other respects the protest is the same in form as that annexed to the petition. To the introduction of this deposition, as well as of the protest, as evidence, the defendant, Nicholls, objected, and his objection was overruled by the court and the papers were laid before the jury. A bill of exceptions was taken to the decision of the court in so admitting this evidence; and the sole 331* question now before us is, whether that decision was right. What that evidence might legally conduce to prove, or what its effect might be if properly admitted, is not now a question before us. It was left to the jury to draw such inferences of fact as they might justly draw from it; and whether they were right or wrong in their inferences we cannot now inquire.

It does not appear that by the laws of Tennessee, a demand of the payment of promissory notes is required to be made by a notary public, or a protest made for non-payment, or notice given by a notary to the indorsers. And by the general commercial law it is perfectly clear that the intervention of a notary is unnecessary in these cases. The notarial protest is not, therefore, evidence of itself, in chief, of the fact of demand, as it would be in cases of foreign bills of exchange; and in strictness of law it is not an official act. But we all know that in point of fact notaries are very commonly employed in this business; and in some of the states it is a general usage so to protest all dishonored notes which are lodged in, or have been discounted by the bank. The practice has doubtless grown up from a sense of its convenience, and the just confidence placed in men who, from their habits and character, are likely to perform these important duties with punctuality and accuracy. We may therefore safely take it to be true in this case, that the protesting of notes, if not strictly the duty of the notary, was in conformity to general practice, and was an employment in which he was usually engaged. If *he had been alive [332 at the trial, there is no question that the protest could not have been given in evidence, except with his deposition, or personal examination, to support it. His death gives rise to the question, whether it is not, connected with other evidence, and particularly with that of his daughter, admissible secondary evidence for the purpose of conducing to prove due demand and notice.<sup>1</sup>

The rules of evidence are of great importance, and cannot be departed from without endangering private as well as public rights. Courts of law are therefore extremely cautious in the introduction of any new doctrines of evidence which trench upon old and established principles. Still, however, it is obvious that as the rules of evidence are founded upon general interest and convenience, they must, from time to time, admit of modifications to adapt them to the actual condition and business of men, or they would work manifest injustice; and Lord Ellenborough has very justly observed that they must expand according to the exigencies of society. (Pritt v. Fairclough, 3 Camp. Rep., 305.) The present case affords a striking proof of the correctness of this remark. Much of the business of the commercial world is done through the medium of bills of exchange and promissory notes. The rules of law require that due notice *and demand shall be proved, to [333 charge the indorser. What would be the consequence, if, in no instance, secondary evidence could be admitted, of a nature like the present? It would materially impair the negotiability and circulation of these important facilities to commerce, since few persons would be disposed to risk so much property upon the chance of a single life; and the attempt to multiply witnesses would be attended with serious inconveniences and expenses. There is no doubt that, upon the principles of law, protests of foreign bills of exchange are admissible evidence of a demand upon the drawee; and upon what foundation does this doctrine rest, but upon the usage of merchants and the universal convenience of mankind? There is not even the plea of absolute necessity to justify its introduction, since it is equally evidence, whether the notary be living or dead. The law, indeed, places a confidence in public officers; but it is here extended to foreign officers acting as the agents and instruments of private parties.

1.—By the French law, inland bills of exchange and promissory notes, as well as foreign bills, are required to be protested; and the protest is the only evidence of demand, and refusal of payment, and notice of non-payment. Code de Commerce, liv. 1, tit. 8, art. 187, 175.

The general objection to evidence, of the character of that now before the Court, is that it is in the nature of hearsay, and the party is deprived of the benefit of cross-examination. That principle also applies to the case of foreign protests. But the answer is that it is the best evidence the nature of the case admits of. If the party is dead we cannot have his personal examination on oath; and the question then arises, whether there shall be a total failure of justice, or secondary evidence shall be admitted to prove 334* facts, where ordinary prudence cannot guard us against the effects of human mortality. Vast sums of money depend upon the evidence of notaries and messengers of banks; and if their memorandums, in the ordinary discharge of their duty and employment, are not admissible in evidence after their death, the mischiefs must be very extensive.

But how stand the authorities upon this subject? Do they as inflexibly lay down the general rule as the objection seems to imply? The written declarations of deceased persons, and entries in their books, have been for a long time admitted as evidence, upon the general ground that they were made against the interest of the parties. Of this nature are the entries made by receivers of money charging themselves, rentals of parties, and bills of lading signed by masters of vessels. More than a century ago it was decided that the entries in the books of a tradesman, made by a deceased shopman, were admissible as evidence of the delivery of the goods, and of other matters there stated within his own knowledge.<sup>1</sup> So, in an action on a tailor's bill, a shop-book was allowed as evidence, it being proved that the servant who wrote the book was dead, and that this was his hand, and he was accustomed to make the entries.<sup>2</sup> In the case of Higham v. Ridgeway (10 East's Rep., 109), it was held that the entry of a midwife in his books in the ordinary 335* course of his business, of the birth of a child, accompanied by another entry in his ledger of the charge for the service and a memorandum of payment at a subsequent date, was admissible evidence of the time of the birth. It is true that Lord Ellenborough, in giving his own opinion, laid stress upon the circumstance that the entry admitting payment was to the prejudice of the party, and, therefore, like the case of a receiver. But this seems very artificial reasoning, and could not apply to the original entry in the day-book, which was made before payment; and even in the ledger the payment was alleged to have been made six months after the service. So that, in truth, at the time of the entry, it was not against the party's interest. And Mr. Justice LeBlanc, in the same case, after observing that he did not mean to give any opinion as to the mere declarations or entries of a midwife who is dead, respecting the time of a person's birth, being made in a matter peculiarly within the knowledge of such a person, as it was not necessary then to determine that question, significantly said: "I would not be bound at present to say that they are not evidence." In the recent case of Hagedorn v. Reid (3 Camp. Rep., 379), in a suit on a policy of insurance where a license was necessary, the original not being found, it was proved that it was the invariable practice of the plaintiff's office (he being a policy broker), that the clerk, who copies any license, sends it off by post and makes a memorandum on the copy of his having done so; and a copy of the license in question was produced from the plaintiff's letter-book, in the handwriting of a deceased clerk, with [*336] a memorandum on it, stating that the original was sent to Doorman; and a witness, acquainted with the plaintiff's mode of transacting business, swore that he had no doubt the original was sent according to the statement in the memorandum. Lord Ellenborough held this to be sufficient evidence of the license. And in Pritt v. Fairclough (3 Camp. Rep., 305), the same learned judge held that the entry of a copy of a letter in the letter book of a party, made by a deceased clerk, and sent to the other party, was admissible in evidence, the letter-book being punctually kept to prove the contents of the letter so sent. And he observed on that occasion, that if it were not so there would be no way in which the most careful merchant could prove the contents of a letter after the death of his entering clerk. The case of Welsh v. Barrett, which has been cited at the bar from the Massachusetts reports,<sup>3</sup> is still more directly in point. It was there held that the memorandums of a messenger of a bank, made in the usual course of his employment, of demands on promissors, and notices to indorsers, in respect to notes left for collection in the bank, were, after his decease, admissible evidence to establish such demands and notices. And the learned chief justice of the court, on that occasion, went into an examination of the grounds of the doctrine, and put the very case of a notarial demand and protest of notes which had been suggested at the bar as a more correct course, as not distinguishable in principle, and [*337] liable to the same objections as the evidence then before the court. We are entirely satisfied with that decision, and think it is founded in good sense, and public convenience. We think it a safe principle, that memorandums made by a person in the ordinary course of his business, of acts or matters which his duty in such business requires him to do for others, in case of his death, are admissible evidence of the acts and matters so done. It is of course liable to be impugned by other evidence, and to be encountered by any presumptions or facts which diminish its credibility or certainty. A fortiori we think the acts of a public officer, like a notary public, admissible, although they may not be strictly official, if they are according to the customary business of his office, since he acts as a sworn officer, and is clothed with public authority and confidence.

It is, therefore, the opinion of the court, that the evidence excepted to in this case was rightly admitted. The variance between the copy and the original protest, as to the time of the demand, might have been explained to the satisfaction of the jury at the trial, but it forms no ground upon which this court is called upon to express any opinion.

338*] [*PROMISSORY NOTE. USURY. LOCAL LAW.]

FLECKNER, Plaintiff in Error,
v.

THE PRESIDENT, DIRECTORS, AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, Defendants in Error.

The act of the 10th of April, 1816, c. 44, incorporating the Bank of the United States, does not, by the 9th rule of the fundamental articles, prohibit the bank from discounting promissory notes, or receiving a transfer of notes in payment of a debt due the bank.

The Bank of the United States, and every other bank, not restrained by its charter, and also private bankers, on discounting notes and bills, have a right to deduct the legal interest from the amount of the note or bill at the time it is discounted.

The Bank of the United States is not restrained by the 9th rule of the fundamental articles of its charter from thus deducting interest, at the rate of six per cent., on notes or bills discounted by it.

Banks, and other commercial corporations, may bind themselves by the acts of their authorized officers and agents without the corporate seal.

The negotiability of a promissory note, payable to order, is not restrained by the circumstance of its being given for the purchase of real property in Louisiana, and the notary, before whom the contract of sale is executed, writing upon it the words "ne varietur," according to the laws and usages of that state, and other countries governed by the civil law.

The statutes of usury of England, and of the states of the Union, expressly provide, that usurious contracts shall be utterly void; but, without such a provision, they are not void as against parties who are strangers to the usury.

The statute incorporating the Bank of the United States does not avoid securities on which usurious interest may have been taken, and the usury cannot be set up as a defense to a note on which it is taken. It is merely a violation of the charter, for which a remedy may be applied by the government.

ERROR to the District Court for the District of Louisiana.

This was a suit brought by the defendants 339*] in error against the plaintiff in error, in the court below, upon a promissory note drawn by him, dated the 26th of March, 1818, for the sum of $10,000, payable to the order of one John Nelder, on the first of March, 1820. The plaintiffs below, in their petition, made title to the note through several mesne indorsements, the last of which was that of the president, &c., of the Planters' Bank of New Orleans, through their cashier, as agent. The answer of the defendant below set up several grounds of defense: (1) That the Bank of the United States purchased the note in question from the Planters' Bank, which was a trading within the prohibitions of the charter of the Bank of the United States. (2) That the transfer was usurious, it having been made in consideration of a loan or discount to the Planters' Bank, upon which more than at the rate of six per centum per annum was taken by the Bank of the United States. (3) That the cashier of the Planters' Bank had no authority to make the transfer. (4) That the making the promissory note by the defendant below was not a mercantile transaction, or governed by mercantile usages or laws, because it was given as the part consideration of the purchase by him of a plantation and slaves, from the said Nelder, and that the notary, before whom the contract of sale was executed and recorded, wrote on the note the words "ne varietur," by which every holder of the note might know it was not a mercantile transaction, and could obtain knowledge of the circumstances under which it was given. And the answer proceeded *to state that Nelder had no title to [*340] a part of the plantation and slaves, and that the note ought not to be paid until the title was made good; and prayed, that the matters thus alleged and put in issue might be inquired of by a jury.

The issue was joined, and it appeared in evidence on the trial that the note in question was discounted for the Planters' Bank, by the Bank of the United States, and, after deducting for the time the note was to run a sum equal to the rate of six per cent. per annum, the residue was carried to the credit of the Planters' Bank, which was at that time indebted to the Bank of the United States in a large sum of money. The counsel for the defendant below moved the Court to instruct the jury, upon this evidence, "that the receiving the transfer of the said promissory note, and the payment of the amount in account, as stated in the evidence, was a dealing in notes, and such dealing was contrary to the provisions of the act incorporating the said bank." The court refused to give the instruction prayed for, but did instruct the jury, "that the acceptance of an indorsed note, in payment of a debt due, is not a trading in things prohibited by the act."

The Court also instructed the jury, that the discount taken by the Bank of the United States was not usurious, and would not defeat their right to recover the amount of the note.

It also appeared in evidence that the board of directors of the Planters' Bank, on the 21st of October, 1818, passed a resolution, "That the president and cashier be authorized to adopt the *most effectual measures to liqui- [*341] date, the soonest possible, the balance due to the office of discount and deposit in this city (New Orleans), as well as all others presently due, and which may in the future become due to any banks of the city." The indorsement of the note was made to the Bank of the United States on the 5th of September, 1819, and before the commencement of the present suit, to wit, on the 27th of June, 1820, the board of directors of the Planters' Bank passed another resolution, to which the corporate seal was annexed, declaring that the two notes of the defendant below (of which the note now in question was one) "were indorsed by the late cashier of the Planters' Bank, by authority of the president and directors, and delivered to the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, and the amount passed to the credit of the Planters' Bank;" and that "the said board of directors do hereby ratify and confirm the said act of their said cashier, as the act of the president, directors, and company of the Planters' Bank." Upon this evidence, the Court instructed the jury that the cashier had authority to indorse the note, and that his indorsement operated a valid transfer.

It further appeared in evidence, that the said note was originally given as a part consideration for the purchase money of a plantation and slaves, purchased by the defendant below, of Nelder, with a covenant to warrant and defend. The contract of sale was drawn up, executed, and recorded, before a notary, according to the laws and usages of the state of Louisiana. The notary, upon the giving of this note, and other notes, for the purchase money, by the defendant below, wrote on each note the words "ne varietur." The Court instructed the jury that the writing of these words did not affect the negotiability of the note.

The defendant below excepted to these several instructions, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, on which judgment was rendered by the court below; and the cause was brought by writ of error to this Court.

Mr. Harper, for the plaintiff in error, argued, (1) That the purchase of the note in question, by the Bank of the United States, from the Planters' Bank, was a dealing or trading within the 9th rule of the fundamental articles of the charter of the Bank of the United States, which provides, "that the said corporation shall not directly or indirectly deal or trade in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent, and not redeemed in due time, or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands." (2) He insisted that the transfer of the note was usurious, as it was made in consideration of a discount, on which the interest was deducted at the time of making the discount, contrary to the provision of the same 9th rule, which declares, that the Bank shall not "take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum, for or upon its loans or discounts." He admitted that this practice of deducting the interest from the sum advanced, at the time the discount was made, was according to the general usage of banks and private bankers. But he denied that this usage was lawful, since it was plain, that by this means more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum was received by the bank upon the sum actually advanced. (3) The cashier of the Planters' Bank had no authority to transfer the note. The transfer must have been made by the corporation, either under its common seal—which is the appropriate legal mode in which these artificial persons are to act—or under the resolution of the 21st of October, 1818, which was supposed to constitute a special authority to the cashier to make the transfer. Upon this resolution there were two questions: 1st. Whether it empowered the cashier to transfer the note by indorsement; and, if not, 2d. Whether the vote of the 27th of June, 1820, ratified the act so as to give it validity. Upon the first question, it should be observed that the power, whatever its extent might be, was joint to the president and cashier, and could not be exercised by either of these officers separately. But the power itself was merely to liquidate the debts due to the bank, which imports no more than an authority to ascertain and settle the amount of the debts. As to the supposed ratification, that which is void in its inception cannot be made good by a subsequent act. If an attorney, not duly appointed, exceeds his authority, his acts cannot receive validity from a subsequent confirmation. The confirmation cannot relate back to, and connect itself with, an act absolutely void. The Planters' Bank could make no contract respecting its corporate property but under its corporate seal, or through the instrumentality of an agent or attorney appointed under that seal. And a contract otherwise made, cannot be confirmed by a subsequent act, which is itself not under seal. (4) The note, in its inception, was not a commercial transaction; it was given for the purchase of real property, and connected by the form of the contract, as executed before the notary, with the sale itself; so that its negotiability was partially restrained by this circumstance, and the title of the vendor to the property having failed, that fact affords a sufficient defense to the maker of the note, into whose hands soever it may have come. And the inscription made by the notary upon the note itself, was intended to give notice to all the world of the origin and nature of the transaction by which its negotiability was restrained.

Mr. Cheves and Mr. Sergeant, contra, contended, (1) That this note was either discounted for the Planters' Bank, or taken as security for, or in payment of a debt, deducting the discount, which is the same thing. The Bank of the United States is not prohibited from buying notes, nor from taking anything whatever in payment, or as security for debts bona fide due.<sup>1</sup> And the great object of the trade of banking, as it is carried on by the private bankers and incorporated companies, is to discount bills and notes. (2) Even if the transfer were usurious, it would not follow that the contract was void. If usurious between the indorser and indorsee, it would not avoid the contract of the drawer, or any previous indorser.<sup>2</sup> The state law, whatever it may be, does not affect the Bank of the United States, or its contracts, which are to be governed by the act of Congress alone. That expressly authorizes the taking discounts on loans, and does not avoid the securities given even for usury. Nor is this contract usurious by the state law, by which the legal rate of interest is 8 per cent., where the parties have not contracted for a greater rate. Not only is it the universal practice of the commercial world, to take discount in advance, but the law has constantly sanctioned this practice, both in England and in this country.<sup>1</sup> (3) As to the indorsement by the cashier it was within the scope of his general authority.<sup>2</sup> A written or parol authority is sufficient to authorize a person to make a simple contract, as agent or attorney, and to bind his principal to the performance of it, without a formal letter of attorney under seal.<sup>3</sup> So, the authority may be implied from certain relations proved to exist between the person who acts as agent and the party for whom he undertakes; and it may sometimes be inferred from the subsequent ratification or acquiescence of the party who is 346*) to be *charged by the writing.<sup>4</sup> But, even supposing the general official character and authority of the cashier were not sufficient, the resolution of the 21st of October, 1818, delegated a sufficient special authority, and was fully ratified and confirmed by the subsequent resolution. The notion that such acts of commercial corporations must be under seal, is exploded in this court.<sup>5</sup> (4) The note being negotiable on the face of it, some circumstance must be shown to restrain its negotiability. The character of the instrument does not depend upon the particular transaction out of which it arises, but upon the general nature of the instrument itself. If that be in itself a negotiable paper, it is equally so in whatever service it may be employed; and if connected with a sale of lands, has all the same incidents as if given upon a purchase of a ship or goods. One of these incidents is, to pass freely by indorsement, transferring the legal and equitable right; and another is, that the indorsee, without notice, takes it free from every equity. But here the circumstances relied on would not constitute a legal defense even in a suit brought by the payee. Here was a mere covenant to warrant and defend, and no actual eviction.<sup>6</sup> Where the purchaser has a covenant in his deed, equity will not relieve him from the payment of a bond 347*) given for the purchase money, *there being no eviction, but will leave him to his remedy at law upon the covenant.<sup>7</sup> And, at law, the damages will be according to the injury actually sustained.<sup>8</sup> There was therefore no defense, either at law or in equity. And if the covenant were actually broken, the recovery would be in damages, which could not be settled in an action on the note. Consequently, the breach of covenant, as to part, at all events, would be no defense.<sup>9</sup> So, if there be a partial failure of consideration, it will not constitute a defense.<sup>10</sup> The words "ne varietur," inscribed by the notary, were merely intended to identify the notes as being those given on the contract of sale.

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court:

The Bank of the United States brought an action in the District Court for Louisiana District, against William Fleckner (the plaintiff in error), upon a promissory note of Fleckner, dated the 26th of March, 1818, for the sum of $10,000, payable to one John Nelder, or order, on the 1st of March, 1820, for value received; and the bank, in their declaration by petition, made title to the same note through several incense indorsements, *the last of which [348 was that of the president, &c., of the Planters' Bank of New Orleans, through their cashier, as agent. The answer of Fleckner sets up several grounds of defense. First, that the Bank of the United States purchased the note in question from the Planters' Bank, which was a trading within the prohibitions of its charter; secondly, that the transfer was usurious, it having been made in consideration of a loan or discount to the Planters' Bank, upon which more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum was taken by the Bank of the United States; thirdly, that the cashier of the Planters' Bank had no authority to make the transfer; fourthly, that the making of the promissory note was not a mercantile transaction, or governed by mercantile usages or laws, because it was given as a part consideration for the purchase by Fleckner of a plantation and slaves from Nelder, and that the notary before whom the sale was executed and recorded wrote on the note, "ne varietur," by which every holder of the note might know it was not a mercantile transaction, and could obtain knowledge of the circumstances under which it was given. And the answer proceeds to state, that Nelder had no title to a part of the plantation and slaves, and that the note ought not to be paid until the title was made good; and it then prays, that the matters thus alleged and put in issue may be inquired of by a jury. The issue was joined, and on trial the jury found a verdict for the Bank of the United States; and the cause now comes before *us upon a writ of error, [349 and a bill of exceptions taken at the trial.

The various grounds assumed by the answer, which are substantially the same as taken by the exceptions, will be considered by the court in the order in which they have been mentioned.

And, first, as to the alleged violation of the charter by the Bank of the United States, in purchasing the note in question. The act of Congress of the 10th of April, 1816, ch. 44, incorporating the bank, in the ninth rule of the fundamental articles, declares (s. 11, art. 9), that "the said corporation shall not, directly or indirectly, deal or trade in anything except bills of exchange, gold or silver bullion, or in the sale of goods really and truly pledged for money lent, and not redeemed in due time, or goods which shall be the proceeds of its lands. It shall not be at liberty to purchase any public debt whatsoever, nor shall it take more than at the rate of six per centum per annum for or upon its loans or discounts." It certainly cannot be a just interpretation of this clause, that it prohibits the bank from purchasing anything but the enumerated articles, for that would defeat the powers given in other parts of the act. The 7th section declares, that the bank shall have capacity to purchase, receive, &c., lands, &c., goods, chattels and effects, of whatsoever kind, nature, and quality, to an amount not exceeding fifty-five millions of dollars, and the same to sell, grant, demise, alien and dispose of. And where the act means to prohibit purchases of any particular thing, it uses the very term, 350*] as in the prohibition *of purchasing any public debt, in this very clause. And certainly there is no pretense to say that if discounting promissory notes be a purchase in point of law, it could have been the legislative intention to include such an act in the prohibition. It is notorious that banking operations are always carried on in our country by discounting notes. The late Bank of the United States conducted, and all the state banks now conduct, their business in this way. The principal profits of banks and, indeed, the only thing which makes them more valuable than private stock, arises from this source. The legislature cannot be presumed ignorant of these facts; and it would be absurd to suppose that it meant to create a bank without any powers to carry on the usual business of a bank. The act contemplates throughout, an authority to make loans and discounts. It provides expressly for the establishment of offices of discount and deposit; and the very clause now under consideration recognizes the power of the bank to make loans and discounts, and restricts it from taking more than six per cent. on such loans or discounts. But in what manner is the bank to loan? What is it to discount? Has it not a right to take an evidence of the debt, which arises from the loan? If it is to discount must there not be some chose in action, or written evidence of a debt, payable at a future time, which is to be the subject of the discount? Nothing can be clearer than that, by the language of the commercial world and the settled practice of banks, a discount by a bank means, ex vi termini, a deduction or draw-351*] back *made upon its advances or loans of money, upon negotiable paper, or other evidences of debt, payable at a future day, which are transferred to the bank. We must suppose that the legislature used the language in this, its appropriate sense; and if we depart from this settled construction, there is none other which can be adopted which would not defeat the great objects for which the charter was granted, and make it, as to the stockholders, a mere mockery. If, therefore, the discounting of a promissory note, according to the usage of banks, be a purchase, within the meaning of the 9th rule above stated (upon which serious doubts may well be entertained), it is a purchase by way of discount, and permitted by necessary inference from the last clause in that rule.

The true interpretations, however, of that rule is, not that it prohibits purchases generally, but that it prohibits buying and selling for the purposes of gain. It aims to interdict the bank from doing the ordinary business of a trader or merchant, in buying and selling goods, &c., for profit, and uses the words "deal" and "trade" in contradistinction to purchases, made for the accommodation or use of the bank, or resulting from its ordinary banking operations. And that this is the true sense of the rule, is strongly evinced by the 12th section of the act, which enforces a penalty for the violation of this very rule. It enacts, that if the bank, "or any person or persons for, or to the use of the same, shall deal or trade in buying or selling goods, wares, merchandise or commodities whatsoever, *contrary to the provisions [352 of this act, all and every person, &c., shall forfeit, &c., treble the value of the goods, &c., in which such dealing and trading shall have been." The words dealing and trading, are used as equivalent in meaning, and they are connected with "goods, wares, merchandises, and commodities," which words, in mercantile language, are always used with reference to corporeal substances, and never to mere choses in action. And as there is no reason to suppose that the penalty was not intended to be co-extensive with the prohibitions of the 9th rule, the exception of bills of exchange in that rule was either inserted ex majori cautela, or designed to authorize the purchase and sale of bills of exchange, at a price above their par value. At all events, doubtful phraseology of this sort cannot be admitted to overrule a clear legislative intention of authorizing discounts; and if so, as there are no words restricting the discounts to any particular kind of paper, the right must equally apply to all kinds.

The evidence in the case shows that the note in question was discounted for the Planters' Bank by the Bank of the United States, and after deducting, for the time the note was to run, a sum equal to the rate of six per cent. per annum, the residue was carried to the credit of the Planters' Bank, which it seems was then indebted to the Bank of the United States in a large sum of money. It is immaterial to the decision of the point now under consideration, whether the discount was for this purpose or not, for whether the *proceeds were to [353 be paid over, or carried to the general credit of the party, or applied to the payment of a pre-existing debt, the transaction was still in substance a discount, and therefore not within the prohibitions of the ninth rule of the charter. The district judge, therefore, who sat at the trial, was perfectly correct in refusing to charge the jury, as the counsel for Fleckner requested, "that the receiving the transfer of the said promissory note, and the payment of the amount in account as stated in the evidence, was a dealing in notes, and such dealing was contrary to the provisions of the act incorporating the said bank." And he was equally correct in charging the jury "that the acceptance of an indorsed note, in payment of a debt due, is not a trading in things prohibited by the act." And this was the whole of his charge on this point brought up by the exceptions.

It may be added upon this point that even if the bank had violated the rule above stated, by this particular transaction, it is not easy to perceive how that objection could be available in favor of Fleckner. The act has not pronounced that such a violation makes the transaction or contract ipso facto void; but has punished it by a specific penalty of treble the value. It would therefore remain to be shown how, if the bank had a general right to discount notes, a contract not made void by the act itself could, on this account, be avoided by a party to the original contract, who was not a party to the subsequent transfer.

354*] *The next point arising on the record is whether the discount taken in this case was usurious. It is not pretended that interest was deducted for a greater length of time than the note had to run, or for more than at the rate of six per cent. per annum on the sum due by the note. The sole objection is the deduction of the interest from the amount of the note at the time it was discounted; and this, it is said, gives the bank at the rate of more than six per cent. upon the sum actually carried to the credit of the Planters' Bank. If a transaction of this sort is to be deemed usurious, the same principle must apply with equal force to bank discounts generally, for the practice is believed to be universal; and probably few, if any, charters contain an express provision authorizing, in terms, the deduction of the interest in advance upon making loans or discounts. It has always been supposed that an authority to discount, or make discounts, did, from the very force of the terms, necessarily include an authority to take the interest in advance. And this is not only the settled opinion among professional and commercial men, but stands approved by the soundest principles of legal construction. Indeed, we do not know in what other sense the word discount is to be interpreted. Even in England, where no statute authorizes bankers to make discounts, it has been solemnly adjudged that the taking of interest in advance by bankers, upon loans, in the ordinary course of business, is not usurious.

If, indeed, the law were otherwise, it would not follow that the transfer to the bank of the 355*] present *note would be void, so that the maker of the note could set it up in his defense. The statutes of usury of the states, as well as of England, contain an express provision that usurious contracts shall be utterly void; and without such an enactment the contracts would be valid, at least in respect to persons who were strangers to the usury. The taking of interest by the bank beyond the sum authorized by the charter would, doubtless, be a violation of its charter, for which a remedy might be applied by the government; but as the act of Congress does not declare that it shall avoid the contract, it is not perceived how the original defendant could avail himself of this ground to defeat a recovery. The opinion of the district judge, that the discount taken in this case was not usurious, and would not defeat the right of recovery of the plaintiffs, was, therefore, unexceptionable in point of law.

The next point is whether the indorsement of the note by the cashier of the Planters' Bank, was sufficient to transfer the property to the original plaintiffs. The evidence on this point was that the board of directors of the Planters' Bank, on the 21st of October, 1818, passed a resolution "that the president and cashier be authorized to adopt the most effectual measures to liquidate, the soonest possible, the balance due to the office of discount and deposit in this city (New Orleans), as well as all others presently due, and Wheat. 8.

which may in the future become due to any banks of the city." The indorsement was made to the Bank of the United States on the 5th of September, *1819; and before the [356 commencement of this suit, viz., on the 27th of June, 1820, the board of directors of the Planters' Bank passed a resolution, to which the corporate seal was annexed, declaring that the two notes of the defendant (of which the present note was one) "were indorsed by the late cashier of the Planters' Bank, by authority of the president and directors, and delivered to the office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States, and the amount passed to the credit of the Planters' Bank, and that the said board of directors do hereby ratify and confirm said act of their said cashier, as the act of the president, directors and company of the Planters' Bank." The act incorporating the Planters' Bank has been examined by the Court; and as to the appointment of the cashier and the authority of the board of directors, it does not differ materially from acts incorporating other banks.

It authorizes the president and directors to appoint a cashier and other officers of the bank, and gives the president and directors, or a majority of them, "full power and authority to make all such rules and regulations for the government of the affairs and conducting the business of the said bank, as shall not be contrary to this act of incorporation." It contains no regulations as to the duties of the cashier, nor any express authority for the corporation to make by-laws. The whole business of the bank is confided entirely to *the directors; and, [357 of course, with them it would rest to fix the duties of the cashier or other officers. Whether they have in fact made any regulations on this subject does not appear; but the acts of the cashier, done in the ordinary course of the business actually confided to such an officer, may well be deemed prima facie evidence that they fell within the scope of his duty.

The first objection urged against this evidence is that the corporation could not authorize any act to be done by an agent, by a mere vote of the directors, but only by an appointment under its corporate seal. And the ancient doctrine of the common law, that a corporation can only act through the instrumentality of its common seal, has been relied upon for this purpose. Whatever may be the original correctness of this doctrine, as applied to corporations existing by the common law, in respect even to which it has been certainly broken in upon in modern times, it has no application to corporations created by statute, whose charters contemplate the business of the corporation to be transacted exclusively by a special body or board of directors. And the acts of such body or board, evidenced by a written vote, are as completely binding upon the corporation and as complete authority to their agents, as the most solemn acts done under the corporate seal. In respect to banks, from the very nature of their operations in discounting notes, in receiving deposits, in paying checks, and other ordinary and daily contracts, it would be impracticable to affix the corporate seal as a confirma-

1.—Act of 15th April, 1811; 1 Martin's Dig. 568, et seq.

358*) tion of each individual act. And if a general authority for such purposes, under the corporate seal, would be binding upon the corporation because it is the mode prescribed by the common law, must not the like authority, exercised by agents appointed in the mode prescribed by the charter, and to whom it is exclusively given by the charter, be of as high and solemn a nature to bind the corporation? To suppose otherwise, is to suppose that the common law is superior to the legislative authority; and that the legislature cannot dispense with forms, or confer authorities, which the common law attaches to general corporations. Where corporations have no specific mode of acting prescribed, the common law mode of acting may be properly inferred; but every corporation created by statute may act as the statute prescribes, and the common law cannot control by implication that which the legislature has expressly sanctioned. Indeed, this very point has been repeatedly under the consideration of this court; and in the case of The Bank of Columbia v. Patterson (7 Cranch's Rep., 299), and The Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. The Bank of Columbia (5 Wheat. Rep., 326), principles were established which settle the point that the corporation may be bound by contracts not authorized or executed under its corporate seal, and by contracts made in the ordinary discharge of the official duty of its agents and officers. We have no doubt, therefore, upon the principles of the common law, that a vote of the board of directors of the 359*) Planters' Bank was as full authority for any act of this nature, to bind the corporation, as if it had passed under the common seal.

But it is to be recollected that the rights and authorities, and mode of transacting business, of the Planters' Bank depend, not upon the common law, but upon the charter of incorporation, and, where that is silent, upon the principles of interpretation and doctrines of the civil law which has been adopted in Louisiana. The civil code of that state declares, that as corporations cannot personally transact all that they have a right legally to do, wherefore it becomes necessary for every corporation to appoint some of their members, to whom they may intrust the direction and care of their affairs, under the name of mayor, president, syndics, directors, or others, according to the statutes and qualities of such corporations; it further declares that the attorneys in fact, or officers thus appointed, have their respective duties pointed out by their nomination, and exercise them according to the general regulations and particular statutes of the corporation; that these officers, by contracting, bind the communities to which they belong in such things as do not exceed the limits of the administration which is intrusted to them; and that if the powers of such officers have not been expressly fixed, they are regulated in the same manner as those of other mandatories.<sup>1</sup> This is all that is contained upon the subject now under consideration in the title of the code professing to treat of corporations, and their 360*) rights, powers and privileges. There is nothing which, in the slightest degree, points to the necessity of using a corporate seal in appointing agents, or authorizing corporate acts; and the fair inference deducible from the silence of the code is that it does not contemplate any such formality as essential to the validity of any official acts done by the officers of the corporation, and gives such acts a binding authority if evidenced by a vote. We may, then, dismiss this point, as to the necessity of the corporate seal, and proceed to consider another objection stated by the counsel for the original defendant. It is, that the cashier had no authority to make this transfer; that the resolution of the 21st of October, 1818, did not confer it originally, and that the subsequent ratification, by the resolution of the 27th of June, 1820, does not give any validity to an ineffectual and unauthorized transfer. We are very much inclined to think that the indorsement of notes, like the present, for the use of the bank, falls within the ordinary duties and rights belonging to the cashier of the bank, at least if his office be like that of similar institutions and his rights and duties are not otherwise restricted. The cashier is usually intrusted with all the funds of the bank, in cash, notes, bills, &c., to be used, from time to time, for the ordinary and extraordinary exigencies of the bank. He receives directly, or through the subordinate officers, all moneys and notes. He delivers up all discounted notes and other property, when payments have been duly made. He draws checks, from time to time, for 361 moneys, wherever the bank has deposits. In short, he is considered the executive officer, through whom, and by whom, the whole moneyed operations of the bank in paying or receiving debts, or discharging or transferring securities, are to be conducted. It does not seem too much, then, to infer, in the absence of all positive restrictions, that it is his duty as well to apply the negotiable funds as the moneyed capital of the bank, to discharge its debts and obligations. And under these circumstances the provision of the civil code already cited may be justly applied, that where his powers are not otherwise fixed, they are to be regulated as other mandatories, or rather, as other agents and factors. In point of practice, it is understood, and was so stated by one of the learned counsel, whose knowledge and experience upon this subject entitle his statement to the highest credit, that these duties are ordinarily performed by the cashiers of banks. And general convenience and policy would dictate this arrangement as most salutary to the interests of the banks. And it may be added that the very act done by the cashier, in this case, with the approbation of the bank, affords some presumption that it was not a usurped authority.

But waiving this consideration, let us attend to the actual features of this case upon the evidence. It is true that the resolution of the 21st of October does not directly, and in terms, authorize this transfer. It is not a resolution conferring a joint authority to the president and cashier, to indorse any note for the bank. It simply requires them to 362 take measures to liquidate the balance due to the original plaintiffs, and other banks. It is merely directory to them, and leaves them to decide as to the time, the mode and the means. As they were not restricted in these respects, they had a resulting right to employ any of the funds of the bank for this purpose, and the negotiable paper of the bank was equally within the scope of the authority as the cash funds, if they should deem it proper to use them. They were at liberty to raise money for this purpose from the general funds, in any way which the ordinary course of business would justify, and which they should deem the most effectual measures. They might, therefore, agree that the cashier should indorse the note in question, and should procure it to be discounted at the Bank of the United States, and the proceeds to be carried to their credit. The presumption that this was an exercise of authority sanctioned by the president, as well as contemplated by the directors, is almost irresistibly proved by the fact that the Planters' Bank has never complained of, but ratified and approved the whole transaction. Some criticism has been employed on the meaning of the word "liquidate," in the resolution above stated. It is said to mean, not a payment, but an ascertainment of the debts of the bank. We think otherwise. Its ordinary sense, as given by lexicographers, is to clear away, to lessen debts. And in common parlance, especially among merchants, to liquidate a balance means to pay it; and this, we are satisfied, was the sense in which the words 363 were used in this resolution, and, consequently, that the appropriation of this note to the payment of the debt was within the scope of the authority given to the president and cashier.

But if this were susceptible of doubt, we think that the subsequent resolution of the directors, of the 27th of June, 1820, is conclusive. That resolution is not a mere ratification of the transfer, but declares that the indorsement was made by the cashier on the 4th of September, 1819, by authority of the president and directors. It is therefore a direct and positive acknowledgment of its original validity, binding on the bank; and if so, it is binding upon all other persons who have not an adverse interest. But if it were only a ratification, it would be equally decisive. No maxim is better settled in reason and law than the maxim omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur, et mandato priori equiparatur; at all events, where it does not prejudice the rights of strangers. And the civil law does not, it is believed, differ from the common law on this subject.<sup>1</sup>

We think, then, that the transfer in this case was made upon sufficient authority; and that, therefore, the opinion of the district judge, affirming the same doctrine, was perfectly correct.

The next point made by the counsel for the original defendant, is that the writing of the words "ne varietur" upon the note, restricted its negotiability. It appeared in evidence that the note in question was given as a part consideration for the purchase money of a plantation and slaves, purchased by Fleckner of Nelder. The instrument of conveyance was drawn, executed and recorded before a notary public, according to the usage in countries governed by the civil law. The notary, upon the giving of this and other notes, for the purchase money by Fleckner, wrote on each note the words in question. There is not the slightest evidence that, by the law or custom of Louisiana, the introduction of these words affects the negotiability of these notes; and, without proof of such law or usage, this court certainly cannot infer the existence of such an extraordinary and inconvenient doctrine. Upon the face of the transaction we should suppose that the words were written merely for the purpose of ascertaining the identity of the notes; and the statement at the bar that this is the explanation given by a very learned notary, confirms this supposition. The opinion of the district judge upon this point also, asserting that the words did not create any restriction upon the negotiability of the note, is, as far as we have any knowledge, a true exposition of the law.

It is unnecessary to pursue this subject farther.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the District Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is adjudged and ordered, that the judgment of the said *365 District Court for the District of Louisiana, in this case, be, and the same is hereby affirmed with costs and damages, at the rate of eight per centum per annum, including interest on the amount of the judgment of the said District Court.

[CHANCERY. LOCAL LAW.]

PHILIP NORBORNE NICHOLAS, ATTORNEY-GENERAL OF VIRGINIA,

v.

RICHARD C. ANDERSON,
SURVEYOR, &c.

Under the act of assembly of Virginia, of October, 1783, for the better locating and surveying the lands given to the officers and soldiers on continental and state establishments, the state of Virginia has no right to call upon the person who was appointed one of the principal surveyors to account for the fees received by him, of one dollar for every hundred acres, on delivering the warrants, towards raising a fund for the purpose of supporting all contingent expenses; the bill filed by the Attorney-General of the state, to compel an account, not sufficiently averring the want of any proper private parties in esse to claim it.

Quere, Whether, in such a case, the assignees of the warrants, or a part of them, suing in behalf of the whole, could maintain a suit, in equity for an account.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

This was a bill in equity, filed by, and in the name of the Attorney-General of Virginia, under the authority of a special act of the legislature of that state, passed on the 15th of February, 1813. The bill charged *366 that the legislature of Virginia, by an act passed in October session, 1783, among other things, provided that all persons holding officers' or soldiers' warrants by assignment, should pay down to the principal surveyor, at the time of the delivery of such warrants, one dollar for every hundred acres thereof, exclusive of the legal surveyor's fees, towards raising a fund for the purpose of paying all contingent expenses, &c., as will appear by reference to the act. That the deputations of officers, in pursuance of the said act, appointed two principal surveyors, one of whom was the defendant, and who immediately took upon himself the duties of the office, and exacted, in virtue of the act of 1783, from all the holders of the military warrants, the one dollar per one hundred acres above provided for. That the defendant had received a large sum of money in this way and had refused to account for the same to the complainant, and the agents and attorneys appointed for this purpose under the act of 1813. It further charged a misapplication of the money; and that the deputations of officers, under the act of 1783, did appoint superintendents, &c., but that most of them are long since dead, and the survivors have declined to act for many years. It proceeded to state the substance of the act of 1813, which authorized Colonel John Watts, the surviving superintendent, agent to settle with the defendant, and to receive the moneys remaining unappropriated in his hands, and if not paid, to sue for and recover the same, in the name of the Attorney-General of Virginia; and then 367*) charged *that the defendant refused to account with Watts, and concluded with a prayer for an account, discovery and general relief. To this bill the defendant demurred; and the Circuit Court of Kentucky, upon argument of the demurrer, held it valid, and dismissed the bill. The cause was then brought by appeal to this Court.

The Attorney-General, for the plaintiff, argued that the state of Virginia still considered the defendant as an officer of that state, and he was so styled in the bill.<sup>1</sup> The demurrer also admitted the fact. The authority given to the superintendent has expired. The defendant, who, as surveyor, has received large sums of money, under an act of the legislature of Virginia, is now called on to account for it. A special act has also been passed to authorize the Attorney-General to proceed in equity, under which the present bill was filed. The argument on the part of the defendant must be that, the deputations of officer no longer existing, the money belongs to him. The state, however, does not claim this money as beneficially entitled to it, but as a trustee for those who are so entitled. She claims, in virtue of her sovereignty, a right to superintend the execution of the law by her own officer. And it is a familiar and well-established principle, that wherever a trust fails, there is a resulting trust in the grantor for the benefit of the cestui que trusts. So, if a corporation 368*) dowed for a particular purpose, *which fails, the funds revert back to the grantor by whom it was created or endowed.<sup>2</sup> and belonged of right to the owners of the warrants, under whose control, or that of the superintendents, it must always remain; and that consequently the state of Virginia had no authority, such as that pretended to be exercised by the special act of 1813, to vest in the Attorney-General of that state, or any other person, a right to sue for the recovery of the sums of money supposed to be due from the defendant. The plaintiff has not shown any interest in the subject, entitling him to sue; nor can there be a resulting trust, where it is not shown that the original trustees are no longer in esse. (2) That the state of Virginia having, previous to the passage of the act, authorized the erection of the district of Kentucky into an independent state, within the limits of which the defendant resided, and where he was to perform his official duties, he was no longer accountable to the state of Virginia, from whom he had not even derived his original appointment; nor could that state, by any legislative act, impose upon him the duty of answering the complaint stated in the bill.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

*The question in this case is, whether [369 the demurrer was well taken. In support of the decree, two points are stated at the bar: 1st, that the plaintiff has not shown any interest in the subject, entitling the state of Virginia to maintain the bill; 2d, that if there was originally any resulting authority to the state to compel an account, that power, by the erection of Kentucky into an independent state, devolved on the latter state, the defendant having been, and still continuing to be, a citizen of that state; and that it was not competent for the legislature of Virginia, in 1813, to pass a law which should bind a citizen of Kentucky to account for official duties which were not performed in virtue of any appointment made by the government of Virginia.

It is unnecessary to consider the last objection, because we are of opinion that the first is fatal to the bill. The act of 1783, for the better locating and surveying the lands given to the officers and soldiers on continental and state establishments, authorizes the deputations of officers, therein named, to appoint superintendents, in behalf of their respective lines, for the purpose of surveying the lands; and also to appoint two principal surveyors, and contract with them for their fees, &c. The third section of the act then provides, "that every person or persons holding officers' or soldiers' warrants, by assignment, shall pay down to the principal surveyors, at the time of the delivering such warrant or warrants, one dollar for every hundred acres thereof, exclusive of the legal surveyor's fees, towards raising a fund for the purpose *of supporting all con- [370 tinent expenses; or, at the option of such holder or holders, the same may be held up until the warrants of all the original grantees have been surveyed; the said surveyors to account for all the money so received, to such person or persons as the said deputations may direct." This is the clause upon which the bill is founded. And it is apparent, that in terms it provides for an accountability, not to the state, but to persons to be appointed by the deputations of officers; to those for whose benefit the fund was raised, and was to be applied, and not to the state, which had no interest whatsoever in it. Even then, if, by the death of all the deputations of officers, without making any appointment, the authority intended by the act became incapable of being executed, there is no averment in the bill to that effect; on the contrary, the bill does admit that superintendents were appointed, of whom some are dead, and the survivors decline to act. If, therefore, under any circumstances, a resulting power could arise to the state to enforce an account, from the want of any proper private parties in esse to claim it, such a case is not stated by the bill. Whether, in such a case, the assignees of the warrants, or a part of them, suing in behalf of the whole, might not maintain a suit in equity for an account, is not for us now to determine. It is sufficient that the state of Virginia, by the very terms of the act, has delegated to other persons, whose existence is not denied, the authority to call the surveyors to account.

1.—Laws of Virg., Ch. Rev. 210.

2.—Co. Litt. 13 b; Godb. 211.

THE PITT. M'NUTT, Claimant.

The non-intercourse act of the 18th of April, 1818, c. 65, prohibits the coming of British vessels to the ports of the United States, from a British port closed against the commerce of the United States, either directly or through an open British port; but it does not prohibit the coming of such vessels from a British closed port, through a foreign port (not British), where the continuity of the voyage is fairly broken.

APPEAL from the Circuit Court of Delaware.

This was an allegation of forfeiture in the District Court of Delaware, against the British sloop Pitt, under the non-intercourse act of April 18th, 1818, c. 65, the first section of which provides, "that, from and after the 30th of September next, the ports of the United States shall be and remained closed against every vessel, owned wholly, or in part, by a subject or subjects of His Britannic Majesty, coming, or arriving from, any port or place in a colony or territory of His Britannic Majesty, that is, or shall be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States; and such vessel that, in the course of the voyage, shall have touched at, or cleared out from, any port or place in a colony or territory of Great Britain, which shall, or may, by the laws of navigation and trade aforesaid, be open to vessels owned by citizens of the United States, shall, nevertheless, be deemed to have 372*] *come from the port or place in the colony or territory of Great Britain, closed as aforesaid against vessels owned by citizens of the United States, from which such vessel cleared out and sailed, before touching and clearing out from an intermediate and open Wheat. 8.

port or place as aforesaid; and every such vessel, so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter, or attempt to enter, the same, in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel and furniture, together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States."

The vessel in question, belonging to British subjects in the Island of Jamaica, departed from the port of Kingston, in that island, on the 16th of August, 1818, with a cargo belonging to the same owners, and a clearance for San Blas, and arrived at Old Providence, a small Spanish island on the coast of Honduras, on the 22d of the same month. At this island the cargo was discharged, and another taken in, consisting principally of Caraccas cocoa, fustic, and Spanish hides. She sailed from thence on the 6th of September following, with orders to come to anchor off the light-house at Cape Henlopen, the western cape of the Delaware Bay, and there wait instructions from the agents of the owners at Philadelphia. The vessel arrived off Fenwick's island, about 30 miles south of the Delaware, on the 29th of September, 1818, when a pilot boarded her, and delivered to the master written instructions from the agents of the owners, not to enter the Delaware, but to proceed to Halifax or Bermuda. But the master *stated that his bread [*373 and water were insufficient for the voyage, and proceeded off the capes of the Delaware to procure a supply of those articles, but was compelled (as alleged) by stress of weather, on the 1st of October, 1818, to put into the Whorekiln Roads opposite to Lewistown, where the vessel was seized by the officers of the revenue for a breach of the act before mentioned.

The District Court pronounced a decree of condemnation, which was reversed in the Circuit Court, and the cause was then brought by appeal to this court.

Mr. Jones, for the appellants, made the following points:

1. That the vessel, together with the cargo on board, was liable to forfeiture, as coming from Kingston, a closed and prohibited British port, within the true intent and meaning of the act of Congress; and that it is immaterial whether the voyage were direct or a circuitous and trading voyage; whether it were a passage upon the seas from one port to another or to several ports; in either case, Kingston was the terminus a quo. That she entered a port of the United States after the 30th of September, 1818, which consummated the forfeiture.

2. That the plea of distress, under which the entryway made, was wholly fictitious.

Mr. Sergeant and Mr. M'Lane, contra, argued, (1) That the act excluded a vessel from the ports of the United States only, 1st. When she is *coming directly from a prohibited [*374 port, in a colony or territory of Great Britain, to the United States; and 2d. When she is coming from such prohibited port, and touches at, and clears out from, a port in a colony or territory of Great Britain, which may be open to the vessels of the United States; and the voyage of the Pitt was of neither character. If she had sailed from Jamaica, which was closed against vessels of the United States, and had touched at, and cleared out from, any intermediate port in a colony or territory of Great Britain, open to vessels of the United States, she would have been excluded by the law; but, having sailed from Jamaica to a Spanish port, and thence, with a new cargo, to the United States, conditionally, her voyage was not prohibited. The object of the navigation act was to deprive British vessels of an indirect trade with the United States, through certain of their own ports, which they might leave open for that purpose, but it never designed to interfere with the direct or indirect trade with Spain or her colonies.

The commercial convention concluded between the United States and Great Britain, on the 3d of July, 1815, did not extend to the British colonies in the West Indies; but, as to them, the navigation laws and colonial system of Great Britain continued in full force, which the United States were at liberty to counteract by any regulations in their power. It was for this purpose the act of Congress was passed. It contemplated a partial, not a general, non-intercourse system. It did not, of course, exclude the entrance of an English vessel, whether documented at home or in a colony, 375* ing *with a cargo of British manufactures or colonial produce, from any other than a prohibited place, without having touched at, in the course of her voyage, any free port in the British colonies. Any article produced in the interdicted colony, may be imported into the United States, in a lawful way, from permitted ports in England, or her colonies, and, a fortiori, from the ports of any other foreign state. Such was the case of the Pitt; she cleared from Kingston for San Blas, and arrived at Old Providence, a Spanish island; there she discharged her cargo, took in another of a different character, and sailed thence to proceed to Philadelphia or Halifax, as circumstances might warrant. Her ultimate destination was not to be determined until her arrival off the coast of the United States, whither she could lawfully come. She was not on a direct voyage from a prohibited port to the United States, nor had she touched at and cleared out from a free port in the British colonies; nor was she even laden with a cargo of the growth or produce of the prohibited colonies.

2. The vessel did not enter, or attempt to enter, the ports of the United States, in violation of the act of Congress.

This is a penal law, and is therefore to be construed strictly. Its general scope and design is to prohibit the trade between the United States and the British ports, in British vessels; but where the entrance into the waters of the United States is not for the purpose of trade, or where it is compulsory and not voluntary, or where it is *occasioned by necessity or stress of weather, it is not a violation of the law.<sup>1</sup> There was evidently no intention, in any part of the voyage, to violate the law; and every reasonable precaution was taken to conform to and respect its provisions. The object of the vessel, in coming off the coast of Delaware, was not to enter the waters of the United States, but to receive instructions as to her ulterior destination. This it was lawful to do. This court has decided, that even under the rigorous non-intercourse system of 1809, a vessel from Great Britain had a right to lay off the coast of the United States to receive instructions from her owners in New York, and, if necessary, to drop anchor; and in case of a storm, to make a harbor, and if prevented by her crew from putting to sea again, might wait in the waters of the United States for provisions.<sup>2</sup> This is the case, therefore, of a vessel bound from a Spanish to a British port, accidentally forced into the waters of the United States, for lawful purposes, and there prevented, by the officers of the United States, from prosecuting her voyage. The testimony in the case proves the necessity to be sufficiently urgent to authorize the entrance of the Pitt into the waters of the United States, under all circumstances, without violating the law; and though the act of Congress designed to prohibit the trading of British vessels with the United States, from the colonies of Great Britain, it could not have *intended to [377 deny the ordinary offices of humanity to such vessels trading with other nations.

Mr. Jones, in reply, insisted that the case was one of a fraudulent evasion of the act. The moment the onus probandi is thrown on a claimant, who, in a revenue cause, sets up a plea of distress to excuse the infraction of the law, he must show by the clearest evidence, that the necessity, under the compulsion of which he professes to have acted, was real.<sup>3</sup> Entering the port, infra fauces portus, is not necessary; and there is more danger to the revenue laws in vessels coming into these by-places, than of their entering ports which are made such by statute. The present voyage is within the mischiefs intended to be guarded against by the prohibition of an indirect voyage, which are as great where the voyage is through a foreign port (not British) as through a British port not closed against our trade.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court:

This vessel, with her cargo, was condemned in the District Court of Delaware, for a violation of the act of April, 1818, entitled, "an act concerning navigation." That decree having been reversed in the Circuit Court, the cause is now brought up by appeal to this court.

Several grounds, in support of the latter adjudication, have been insisted on in the argument; but *the court deem it unnecessary to advert to more than one, as that will dispose of the case finally, and fix the most important point which it presents, to wit, the correct construction of the first section of the act in question.

We are unanimously of opinion that the construction insisted on by the claimant's counsel is the only correct construction. It is perfectly clear that the case of this vessel is not literally comprised within the provisions of this act, for it only prohibits a voyage from a closed port of Great Britain to a port of the United States; and the purport and effect of the latter part of the first clause amounts to no more than a declaration that the continuity of such a voyage shall not be broken by the act of touching at, or clearing out from, any port of a colony or territory of Great Britain which may be open to American shipping.

But it has been contended, in behalf of the appellants, that although not within the letter, it is within the mischief intended to be obviated by the statute, and, therefore, subject to the penalty.

If by this argument it be intended to maintain that acts done in fraud of a law are acts in violation of the law, the principle may be conceded; but we fully concur in the views of the policy of this law, as explained by the claimant's counsel, and are satisfied that the latter provisions of the first clause were solely intended to guard against the effects which the permission of a general trade at one or more of the British colonial ports may have had in defeating the policy of the act altogether. The 379* legislature had not in view a fair *unaffected trade through the ports of any other nation. It is obvious that attempts might have been made to evade the law by an affected trade through an intermediate port, and it is not to be supposed that this government, or its courts, would have failed to check such an attempt; but we are fully satisfied that this was not such a case. The evidence of fairness is full and unequivocal. There was time, even upon ordinary calculation, to have completed the voyage from Jamaica to Old Providence, and thence to Philadelphia, before the prohibition was by law to take effect, as is proved by the fact of her having arrived in the Delaware at a time which left it doubtful whether she was or was not within the period specified for its suspension. The cargo, too, was taken in at the port of Old Providence, and was of a description well known to belong to the trade of that port, from its having been the depot of captures, and probably of a covered trade from the continent of South America. Everything conspires to exempt the vessel from the charge of fraudulent intention, and, therefore, leaves no ground for the condemnation.

380* [*INSTANCE COURT. SLAVE TRADE ACT.]

THE MARY ANN. PLUMER, Claimant.

A libel of information, under the 9th section of the slave trade act of March 2d, 1807, c. 77, alleging that the vessel sailed from the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, without the captain's having delivered the manifests required by law to the collector or surveyor of New York and Perth Amboy, is defective; the act requiring the manifest to be delivered to the collector or surveyor of a single port.

Under the same section, the libel must charge the vessel to be of the burthen of 40 tons or more. In general, it is sufficient to charge the offense in the words directing the forfeiture; but if the words are general, embracing a whole class of individual subjects, but must necessarily be so construed as to embrace only a subdivision of that class, the allegation must conform to the legislative sense and meaning.

Where the libel is so informal and defective that the court cannot enter up a decree upon it, and the evidence discloses a case of forfeiture, this court will not amend the libel itself, but will remand the cause to the court below, with directions to permit it to be amended.

A PPEAL from the District Court of Louisiana.

This was an allegation of forfeiture in the court below, against the brig Mary Ann, for a violation of the act of March 2d, 1807, c. 77, prohibiting the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the 1st day of January, 1808. The libel contained two counts: The first alleged that the brig Mary Ann, on the 10th of March, 1818, sailing coastwise from a port in the United States, to wit, the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, *to a port or place within the jurisdic- [*381 tion of the same, to wit, the port of New Orleans, and having on board certain negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, for the purpose of transporting them to be sold or disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor, to wit, No. 1, Lydia, &c., did, laden and destined as aforesaid, depart from the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, where she then was, without the captain or commander having first made out and subscribed duplicate manifests of every negro, mulatto, and person of color, on board said brig Mary Ann, and without having previously delivered the same to the collectors or surveyors of the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, and obtained a permit, in manner as required by the act of Congress, in such case made and provided, contrary to the form of said act. The second count was, for taking on board thirty-six negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, previous to her arrival at her said port of destination, contrary to the act, &c.<sup>1</sup>

*The court below condemned the [*382 vessel, as liable to forfeiture under the act referred to, and the claimant appealed to this court.

**Mr. D. B. Ogden*, for the appellant, [*383 argued, (1) That the libel was insufficient in its allegations to sustain the sentence which had been rendered by the court below. It alleges, that the vessel sailed from the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, without the captain's

1.—The ninth section of the act, on which this proceeding was grounded, provides, "that the captain, master, or commander of any ship or vessel, of the burthen of forty tons or more, from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eight, sailing coastwise, from any port in the United States to any port or place within the jurisdiction of the same, having on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, for the purpose of transporting them, to be sold or disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor, shall, previous to the departure of such ship or vessel, make out and subscribe duplicate manifests of every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, on Wheat. 8. U. S., Book 5.

board such ship or vessel, therein specifying the name and sex of each person, their age and stature, as near as may be, and the class to which they respectively belong, whether negro, mulatto, or person of color, with the name and place of residence of every owner or shipper of the same, and shall deliver such manifests to the collector of the port, if there be one, otherwise to the surveyor, before whom the captain, master, or commander, together with the owner, or shipper, shall severally swear or affirm, to the best of their knowledge and belief, that the persons therein specified were not imported or brought into the United States from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight having made out the duplicate manifests required by law, and without his having previously delivered the same to the collectors or surveyors of the ports of New York and Perth Amboy. This is too vague and general. The act directs the manifest to be delivered to the collector or surveyor of a single port. (2) The libel alleges that the manifest required by law was not made out and delivered before the vessel sailed. But this allegation, as laid, is disproved by the manifest itself, which is in evidence; and if the prosecutor intended to have availed himself of any defects in the manifest, those defects ought to have been specified in the libel. It ought to have charged the not specifying the names, &c., if it was intended to rely on that objection. (3) The libel does not bring the case within the ninth section of the act, on which it is founded, by stating that the vessel was "of the burthen of forty tons, or more." The clause of forfeiture, in the latter part of that section, although it is in general terms, "any vessel," &c., ought, upon every just principle of interpretation, to be restricted to the vessels of forty tons or more, which are mentioned in the first part of the section. It is not sufficient to charge the offense in the very words of the statute, but the sense and effect of those words must be looked to, so as to 384* give the party notice of the precise offense meant to be charged.<sup>1</sup>

The Attorney-General, contra, insisted that this case did not at all resemble that of The Hoppet, where the ship and the innocent goods were held not to be forfeited, because there was no charge applicable to them, inasmuch as they were not alleged to belong to the owner of the prohibited articles—the French wines. This libel of information does not merely contain a general reference to the law; it gives the party precise notice of the charge, and secures him against any other prosecution for the same offense, which is all that can reasonably be required. In the case of The Samuel,<sup>2</sup> there was a more serious objection to the form of the allegation, which, however, did not prevail. Those technical niceties, which were once insisted on in criminal informations at common law, are not regarded in admiralty informations, which are modeled upon the more liberal and rational principles of the civil law. A libel may even allege the offense in the alternative of several facts, if each alternative constitute a substantive offense and cause of forfeiture.<sup>3</sup> Here it charges the non-delivery of a manifest, as required by the act, and the proof is a delivery of a manifest totally defective in every particular required by the act.

**Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL* delivered the opinion of the court, and, after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

Several objections have been made to the libel in this case. The first is, that it alleges the brig Mary Ann to have sailed from the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, without the captain's having first made out and subscribed the duplicate manifests required by law, and without his having previously delivered the same to the collectors or surveyors of the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, whereas the act of Congress directs the manifest to be delivered to the collector or surveyor of a single port.

This objection is thought fatal. The libel either requires more than the law requires, and charges, as the cause of forfeiture, that the manifest was not delivered to the collectors or surveyors of two ports, while the law directs that it should be delivered to the collector or surveyor only of one; or it is too vague and uncertain, in not alleging, with precision, the port where the offense was committed.

It is probable that the district attorney might be uncertain whether the brig sailed from the port of Perth Amboy or of New York; but this circumstance ought to produce no difficulty, since the offense might have been laid singly in each port, and charged expressly, in separate counts.

The second objection is this:

The libel charges that the manifest required by law was not made out and delivered before the vessel sailed.

*The counsel contends that a manifest was delivered; that this charge is therefore disproved by the fact; and that if the libellant would avail himself of any defects in the manifest, they ought to be specified in the libel.

Whether a libel, charging, generally, that manifests have not been made out and delivered, as required by the act of Congress, would be considered as sufficiently disproved by producing a manifest not strictly conformable to law, is a question which belongs certainly to the merits of the cause, and which would deserve consideration on the inquiry how far the defectiveness of the manifest was put in issue by such a libel. But certainly no particular defect can be alleged when there is no manifest; and, of consequence, the allegation that the manifests required by law were not made hundred and eight, and that, under the laws of the state, they are held to service or labor; whereupon the said collector or surveyor shall certify the same on the said manifests, one of which he shall return to the said captain, master, or commander, with a permit, specifying thereon the number, names, and general description of such persons, and authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination. And if any ship or vessel, being laden and destined as aforesaid, shall depart from the port where she may then be, without the captain, master, or commander, having first made out and subscribed duplicate manifests of every negro, mulatto, and person of color, on board such ship or vessel as aforesaid, and without having previously delivered the same to the said collector or surveyor, and obtained a permit, in manner as herein required, or shall, previous to her arrival at the port of her destination, take on board any negro, mulatto, or person of color, other than those specified in the manifests, as aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States, and may be seized, prosecuted, and condemned, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof: and the captain, master, or commander of every such ship or vessel, shall, moreover, forfeit, for every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, so transported, or taken on board, contrary to the provisions of this act, the sum of one thousand dollars, one moiety thereof to the United States, and the other moiety to the use of any person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect."

out, would be sufficient on a demurrer. They are, of course, sufficient for the present inquiry.

Another objection, on which the court has felt great difficulty is, that the libel does not state that the brig Mary Ann was "of the burthen of forty tons or more."

The ninth section of the act of Congress, on which this prosecution was founded, enacts that "the captain," &c., "of any ship or vessel of the burthen of forty tons or more," and "sailing coastwise," &c., "having on board any negro," &c., "shall, previous to the departure of such ship or vessel, make out and deliver duplicate manifests," &c. "And if any ship or vessel, being laden and destined as aforesaid, 387"] shall depart from *the port where she may then be, without the captain, master or commander, having first made out and subscribed duplicate manifests of every negro, mulatto and person of color on board such ship or vessel as aforesaid, and without having previously delivered the same to the said collector or surveyor and obtained a permit, in manner as herein required," "every such ship or vessel," &c., "shall be forfeited to the use of the United States."

The first step in this inquiry respects the extent of the clause of forfeiture. Does it comprehend vessels under forty tons burthen?

Although the language of the sentence is general, yet those rules for construing statutes, which are dictated by good sense and sanctioned by immemorial usage, which require that the intent of the legislature shall have effect, which intent is to be collected from the context, restrain, we think, the meaning of those terms to vessels of the burthen of forty tons and upwards.

The burthen enters essentially into the description of those vessels which can commit the offense prohibited by this section. Only vessels of forty tons or more are directed to make out and deliver the manifests prescribed by the act; and only such vessels could obtain the permit. The whole provision must have been intended for vessels of that burthen only, or the words would have been omitted. When, then, the act proceeds, after prescribing the duty, to punish the violation of it, the words, "any ship 388"] or vessel," must be applied *to those ships or vessels only to which the duty had been prescribed. We understand the clause in the same sense as if the word "such" had been introduced.

The construction of this section may receive some illustration from the eighth and the tenth.

The eighth section prohibits the commander of any ship or vessel of less burthen than forty tons to take on board any negro, mulatto or person of color, for the purposes described in the ninth section, on penalty of forfeiting, for every such negro, &c., the sum of $800. But no forfeiture of the vessel is inflicted in this section. The words imposing forfeiture are, "and if any ship or vessel, being laden and destined as aforesaid." Now, the preceding part of the section, to which these words refer, is confined to vessels of forty tons and more. The act proceeds, "shall depart," "without the commander having first made out," &c., "duplicate manifests, as aforesaid;" showing that the general words, "any ship or vessel," meant those ships or vessels only which had been directed to make out these manifests, and without having obtained a permit "in manner as herein prescribed." Now, only a vessel of forty tons and more could obtain the permit directed. The section proceeds to enact that every such ship or vessel shall be forfeited, and the commander thereof shall moreover forfeit, for every such negro, &c., the sum of one thousand dollars.

It is perfectly clear that this pecuniary penalty is co-extensive with the forfeiture of the vessel. But it cannot extend to the commanders of vessels *under forty tons, because *389 the eighth section has inflicted on the commanders of such vessels, for the same offense, the penalty of eight hundred dollars.

The tenth section inflicts a penalty of $10,000 on the commander who shall land negroes, &c., transported coastwise, without delivering to the collector the duplicate manifests prescribed by the ninth section. This section was unquestionably intended to be co-extensive with the ninth, and is, in terms, confined to vessels of the burthen of forty tons or more.

We think that the legislature has inflicted forfeiture for the failure to make out, subscribe and deliver a manifest on those vessels only which are directed to perform those acts; that is, only on vessels of the burthen of forty tons or more.

The question then recurs, is the omission to charge that the brig Mary Ann was a vessel of the burthen of forty tons or more, fatal to this libel?

It is, in general, true that it is sufficient for a libel to charge the offense in the very words which direct the forfeiture; but this proposition is not, we think, universally true. If the words which describe the subject of the law are general, embracing a whole class of individuals, but must necessarily be so construed as to embrace only a subdivision of that class, we think the charge in the libel ought to conform to the true sense and meaning of those words as used by the legislature. In this case, if the brig Mary Ann be a vessel under forty tons, her commander is liable to a pecuniary penalty, but the court cannot pronounce *a sentence of forfeiture against *390 her. If she be of the burthen of forty tons or more, the commander is liable to a heavier pecuniary penalty, and the vessel is forfeited. The libel ought to inform the court that the vessel is of that description which may incur forfeiture.

We think, therefore, that the sentence of the District Court of Louisiana must be reversed for these defects in the libel; but as there is much reason to believe that the offense for which the forfeiture is claimed has been committed, the cause is remanded to the District Court of Louisiana, with directions to permit the libel to be amended.

Decree reversed.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the District Court of Louisiana, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the libel filed in the said cause is insufficient to sustain the sentence pronounced by the District Court, because it does not state, with sufficient certainty, the port in which the offense charged therein was committed; and because, also, it does not allege that the brig Mary Ann was of the burthen of forty tons or more. This court is of opinion, that the sentence of the District Court of Louisiana, condemning the brig Mary Ann, her tackle, apparel and furniture, as forfeited to the United States, is erroneous, and doth reverse and annul the same; and this court doth further adjudge, order and decree, that the cause be remanded 391* to the Court of the United States for the District of Louisiana, with directions to allow the libel to be amended, and to take such further proceedings in the said cause as law and justice may require.

[INSTANCE COURT. JURISDICTION.]

THE SARAH. HAZARD, Claimant.

In cases of seizures made on land under the revenue laws, the District Court proceeds as a court of common law, according to the course of the exchequer on informations in rem, and the trial of issues of fact is to be by jury; but in cases of seizures on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, it proceeds as an instance court of admiralty, by libel, and the trial is to be by the court.

A libel charging the seizure to have been made on water, when in fact it was made on land, will not support a verdict, and judgment or sentence thereon; but must be amended or dismissed. The two jurisdictions, and the proceedings under them, are to be kept entirely distinct.

APPEAL from the District Court of Louisiana.

This was a libel of information in the court below, against 422 casks of wine, imported in the brig Sarah, and afterwards seized at New Orleans, alleging a forfeiture to the United States by a false entry in the office of the collector of the port of New York, made for the benefit of drawback, on re-exportation, and stating that the seizure was made on waters 392* navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen. In the progress of the cause, it appeared that the seizure was in fact made on land; which fact was suggested to the court by the claimant's proctor, who moved that the cause should be tried by a jury. The court accordingly directed a jury, which was sworn, and found a verdict for the United States. On this verdict, a sentence of condemnation was pronounced by the court; and the cause was brought to this court by appeal on the part of the claimant.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, for the appellant, argued that the decree must be reversed, on account of the multiplied irregularities in the proceedings. It was, in the words of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 9, "a civil cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," according to the allegation of the libel, which stated the seizure to be on water. But it afterwards assumed the shape of an exchequer cause, and the trial was by jury, upon which the court rendered, not a judgment, but a sentence of condemnation. The district court is both a court of admiralty, and a court of common law. In the former branch of its jurisdiction, it proceeds as an instance court, by a libel in rem, which is to be tried by the court;<sup>1</sup> in the latter, it proceeds, in revenue causes, by an information in rem, which is to be tried by the jury. *The two juris- 393 dictions, and the proceedings under each, are to be kept entirely distinct. One consequence of blending them together is apparent. Where the seizure is on water, the claimant has a right to further proof in this court, under certain circumstances; which he will be entirely deprived of if the proceedings are to be according to the course of the common law, as the facts could not be reviewed by writ of error.

The Attorney-General, contra, insisted that a libel and an information were convertible terms. This was a libel of information, on which, as the seizure was on land, the party had a right to a trial by jury. That right was secured by the constitution, in all cases at common law, where the value in controversy exceeds twenty dollars; and in such cases, the facts tried by a jury cannot be re-examined, otherwise than according to the course of the common law.<sup>2</sup> Here an attempt is made to re-examine them by an appeal, and the cause may be dismissed from this court on that ground. Supposing the proceeding, however, to have been according to the course of the civil law, there is nothing to prevent the instance court of admiralty from trying facts by a jury, in the same manner as the court of chancery directs an issue. The judices selecti, of ancient Rome, were a sort of jury who acted under the superintendence of the prætor, as his assessors in the determination of questions of fact.

By the act constituting the judicial system of the United States, the district courts are courts both of common law and admiralty jurisdiction. In the trial of all cases of seizure, on land, the court sits as a court of common law. In cases of seizure made on waters navigable by vessels of ten tons burthen and upwards, the court sits as a court of admiralty. In all cases at common law, the trial must be by jury. In cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, it has been settled, in the cases of The Vengeance (reported in 3 Dallas' Rep., 297), The Sally (in 2 Cranch's Rep., 406), and The Betsy and Charlotte (in 4 Cranch's Rep., 443), that the trial is to be by the court.

Although the two jurisdictions are vested in the same tribunal, they are as distinct from each other as if they were vested in different tribunals, and can no more be blended than a court of chancery with a court of common law.

The court for the Louisiana district, was sitting as a court of admiralty; and when it was shown that the seizure was made on land, its jurisdiction ceased. The libel ought to have been dismissed, or amended, by charging that the seizure was made on land.

The direction of a jury, in a case where the libel charged a seizure on water, was irregular; and any proceeding of the court, as a court of admiralty, after the fact that the seizure was 395* made on land *appeared, would have been a proceeding without jurisdiction.

The court felt some disposition to consider this empaneling of a jury, at the instance of the claimants, as amounting to a consent that the libel should stand amended; but, on reflection, that idea was rejected.

If this is considered as a case at common law, it would be necessary to dismiss this appeal, because the judgment could not be brought before this court but by writ of error. If it be considered as a case of admiralty jurisdiction, the sentence ought to be reversed, because it could not be pronounced by a court of admiralty, on a seizure made on land.

As the libel charges a seizure on water, it is thought most advisable to reverse all the proceedings to the libel, and to remand the cause to the District Court for farther proceedings, with directions to permit the libel to be amended.

DECREE.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the District Court of Louisiana, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, it is decreed and ordered that the sentence of the District Court for the District of Louisiana, condemning the said 422 casks of wine as forfeited to the United States, be, and the same hereby is reversed and annulled. And it is further decreed and ordered that the cause be remanded to the said District Court of Louisiana, with directions to allow the libel in this case to be amended, and 396* to take such farther proceedings* in the said cause as law and justice may require.<sup>1</sup>

1.—It is stated in the Life of Sir Leoline Jenkins, Vol. I., p. lxxxvii, that the admiralty in England had an original inherent jurisdiction of seizures for a breach of the navigation laws. See also his charge at the admiralty sessions for the cinque ports. Id. p. xcv, et seq. Charge at the Old Bailey Sessions. Again, Sir L. Jenkins says: "Nor is there anything granted to the lord admiral in this commission, but what he was possessed of long before these commissions grounded upon the statute of piracy were known; for, by the inquisition taken at Queenborough (49 Edw. III.), and by the statutes of the Black Book in the admiralty, much ancients than that inquisition, the transporting of prohibited goods particularly, and so of other offenses, was to be inquired of, and tried before the lord admiral; and in the articles usually given in charge at the admiralty sessions of England, to this day, the inquiry after transporters of prohibited goods is given in charge to the jury," &c. Id., Vol. II., p. 746. So, also, he says, in a letter to Sir Thomas Exton, July 2, 1675, "the course would be the same in every other case; for instance, in carrying prohibited goods, such as would confiscate the ship, where the judgment" (jurisdiction) "remains in the admiralty, as some you know do this day, though such judgments, in many cases, have been of late transferred to other courts by act of Parliament. Id., Vol. II., p. 708. But Sir James Marriot says, in the case of the Columbia, in 1782, that "the court of admiralty derives no jurisdiction in cases of revenue (appropriated by the common law to the court of exchequer), from the patent of its judge, or the ancient jurisdiction of the crown in the person of its lord high admiral. The first statute which places judgment of revenue in the plantations with the courts of admiralty, is the 12th of Charles II." 2 Bro. Civ. & Adm. Law, 492, Note 3. But in Great Britain, all appeals from the colonial vice-admiralty courts in those causes, are to the High Court of Admiralty, and not to the privy council, which is the appellate tribunal in other plantation causes. This point was determined in 1754, in the case of The Vrow Dorothea, before the High Court of Delegates, which was an appeal from the vice-ad-

THE FRANCES AND ELIZA

COATES, Claimant.

If a British ship come from a foreign port (not British) to a port of the United States, the continuity of the voyage is not broken, and the vessel is not liable to forfeiture, under the act of April 18th, 1818, c. 65, by touching at an intermediate British closed port, from necessity, and in order to procure provisions without trading there.

APPEAL from the District Court of Louisiana.

This was an allegation of forfeiture, against the British ship Frances and Eliza, in the court below, for a breach of the act of Congress, of the 18th of April, 1818, c. 65, the first section of which is in these words: "That from and after the 30th day of September next, the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel, owned wholly, or in part, by a subject or subjects of His Britannic Majesty, coming or arriving from any port or place in a colony or territory of His Britannic Majesty, that is or shall be, by the ordinary miralty judge of South Carolina, to *the High [*397] Court of Admiralty, and thence to the delegates. The appellate jurisdiction was contested upon the ground that prosecutions for the breach of the navigation, and other revenue laws, were not, in their nature, causes civil and maritime, and under the ordinary jurisdiction of the court of admiralty, but that it was a jurisdiction specially given to the vice-admiralty courts by stat. 7 and 8, Wm. III., c. 22, s. 6, which did not take any notice of the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty in such cases. The objection, however, was overruled by the delegates, and the determination has since received the unanimous concurrence of all the common law judges, on a reference to them from the privy council. 2 Rob. 246. Whether this jurisdiction of the colonial courts of vice-admiralty over seizures for a breach of the revenue laws was a part of the original admiralty jurisdiction, inherent in those courts, or was derived from the statutes of Charles II. and William III., it is certain that it was uniformly exercised by those courts in this country before the revolution; and such seizures upon water were very early determined by this court to be "cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," within the meaning of those terms, as used in the constitution. But revenue seizures made on land have been uniformly left to their natural forum, and to their appropriate proceeding, which is an exchequer information in rem. These informations are not to be confounded with criminal informations at common law, or with an information of debt, which is the king's action of debt. They are civil proceedings in rem, and may be amended in the district court where they are commenced, or in the circuit court upon appeal. Anonymous, 1 Gallis. Rep. 22. But if merits appear in this court, and an amendment is wanted to make the allegations correspond to the proof, the amendment will not be made by this court, but the cause will be remanded, with directions to permit an amendment, and for further proceedings. laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States: and such vessel that, in the course of the voyage, shall have touched at, or cleared out from any port or place in a colony or territory of Great Britain, which shall or may be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade aforesaid, open to vessels owned by citizens of the 399* United States, shall, nevertheless, be deemed to have come from the port or place in the colony or territory of Great Britain closed, as aforesaid, against vessels owned by citizens of the United States, from which such vessel cleared out and sailed, before touching at and clearing out from an intermediate and open port or place as aforesaid; and every such vessel so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter, or attempt to enter the same, in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel and furniture, together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States."

The libel set forth, in the words of the act, that the Frances and Eliza was owned, wholly or in part, by subjects of His Britannic Majesty, and had come from the port of Falmouth, in the Island of Jamaica, a colony of His Britannic Majesty, which port was closed against citizens of the United States, and that she attempted to enter the port of New Orleans, in the United States, contrary to the provisions of the act before recited. To this libel, William Coates, master of the vessel, put in an answer denying the allegations in the libel, and claiming her as the property of Messrs. Herring & Richardson, of London. The material facts appearing on record, are these:

The Frances and Eliza sailed from London, in the month of February, 1819, for South America, having on board about 170 men for the service of the patriots. They arrived at Margarita in April, where the troops were disembarked. The vessel remained on the coast 400* of Margarita until November, *when Captain Coates, by order of Mr. Gold, agent of the owners, took command of her. Captain Storm, who originally was the master, died on the passage, and was succeeded by the first mate, who died at Margarita. Captain Coates was directed by the agent to proceed with the Frances and Eliza to New Orleans, and there to procure freight to England or the continent. The death of the agent in the month of October, obliged him to remain some time at Margarita, to arrange his affairs in the best manner he could. Having a scanty supply of salt provisions, and being without fresh provisions, which were not to be had at Margarita, he did not sail from that port until the 8th of November. Proceeding on the voyage, he met an American schooner off the west end of St. Domingo, the master of which supplied him with a cask of beef. He had at this time 29 souls on board; and in the prosecution of the voyage, being off the coast of Falmouth, in the Island of Jamaica, the Frances and Eliza hove to, within four or five miles of the shore, and the master went into Falmouth in his boat for provisions, of which they were much in want, having only three days' supply on board, and to get his name indorsed on the ship's register. On the day following, he returned with a small supply, which being insufficient, he went again the next morning, to endeavor to increase his stock, and succeeded in getting enough to enable him to proceed to New Orleans. That he landed one passenger at Falmouth, and took two from thence to New Orleans. The passenger landed was a physician *who had sailed from London with the [*401 troops, but left the service in distress, and took his passage in the Frances and Eliza to New Orleans. When at Falmouth, he found his professional prospects there favorable, and determined to remain; and George Glover, a mariner, had leave of the agent of the owners to work his passage from Margarita to New Orleans. Upon leaving Margarita the master took with him a letter of recommendation from the agent of the owners, to R. D. Shepherd & Co., of New Orleans, which letter he presented on his arrival. When he had proceeded about half way up the Mississippi, the Frances and Eliza was hailed by an officer on board the revenue cutter, the answer was that she was from Jamaica; the captain being asked "what he was doing off Jamaica," answered, that he "went in to get his name indorsed on the register, and to obtain a freight for England;" to which the officer replied that he was under the necessity of seizing his vessel for a breach of the navigation act. He then said he went in to get provisions.

Upon this testimony the District Court condemned the vessel as forfeited to the United States, and the claimant appealed to this court.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, for the appellant, argued that the vessel, on sailing from Margarita, was really bound to New Orleans, and not to Falmouth, in the Island of Jamaica; that even supposing she was bound to Falmouth, it was a mere alternative destination, depending on her being able to procure freight there; and that, as she in *fact embraced the [*402 other branch of the alternative and went to New Orleans, this must be considered as her original destination. That the real object of touching at Falmouth was to obtain provisions, of which she was in want, and not to procure freight; and that even if touching there for the purpose of procuring freight could bring her within the operation of the act, it was impossible to attribute that effect to a mere touching to get necessary provisions. That the act, according both to its policy and its true legal constructions, makes the clearing out and sailing from a prohibited port the criterion of illegality, and not the mere touching at it for whatever purpose; and that the touching at Falmouth, be its purpose what it might, did not make it the terminus a quo of the supposed illegal voyage, and consequently did not bring the vessel within the purview of the act. He also insisted on the defectiveness of the libel, in alleging an attempt to enter a port of the United States, when, in fact, the vessel did actually enter.

The Attorney-General, contra, insisted that the allegation was sufficient to support the sentence, in stating that the vessel "attempted to enter the port of New Orleans, contrary to the provisions of the act." &c. She did actually enter the river, and was attempting to get up to New Orleans. But an attempt is included, necessarily, within the actual entry, and the prohibition is in the alternative, "shall enter, or attempt to enter." As to the British port from which the vessel came or arrived, the statute 403* does not require that the vessel should actually enter infra fauces portus, or that she should take a cargo on board in the closed port. To insist upon an actual entry of the harbor, or an actual trading, would make the law wholly ineffectual. The first destination of the vessel was evidently to Falmouth, there to seek for a cargo. Failing in that, her destination was changed to the United States. Such a course of navigation is manifestly against the policy of the law, which was intended to cut off all trade or intercommunication with the closed ports. The legislative intention must be regarded in the construction of laws of trade and revenue, and it is the habit of all maritime courts to regard it.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Harper, for the appellant, in reply, insisted that the object of the act being to counteract the exclusive system of Great Britain in favor of her colonial monopoly, and the carrying trade connected with it, the circumstance that a vessel, in the course of a voyage not prohibited, touched at a prohibited port, was not sufficient to bring it within the mischief intended to be avoided. The language of the act is, "coming or arriving from a port," &c. This cannot apply to a port where she never entered. She never came to anchor, but stood on and off. The port of Falmouth could not, therefore, be regarded as the terminus a quo of the voyage. The prohibitions of this statute are not like the belligerent prohibitions to enter a blockaded port, and the intention of the master has 404* nothing to do with it. Even supposing that he went to seek for a cargo, he would not have brought it to the United States, and consequently did not go for the purpose of violating the law. The criterion of a breach of the law is, the clearing out and sailing from a closed port. The touching at an intermediate open port will not, certainly, break the continuity of a voyage which has been commenced at an interdicted port. But then it must have been actually commenced there; and, in this case, the terminus a quo was an innocent port.

Mr. Justice DUVALL delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the facts, proceeded as follows:

In the argument of this cause, it was contended by the Attorney-General, that touching at Falmouth, with the intention to get freight there, and coming from that port to a port in the United States, brought the Frances and Eliza within the operation of the navigation act; it being the policy of the law to prevent all communication between vessels of the United States and British ports, which were closed against them. On behalf of the owners, it was contended that if the Frances and Eliza was bound to Falmouth, it was a mere alternative destination, depending on her being able to get freight there; and that as she in fact embraced the other branch of the alternative, and went to New Orleans, this must be considered as her original destination.

If the destination of the Frances and Eliza,

*from Margarita to New Orleans was [405] real, not colorable; and if the touching at Falmouth was for the purpose of procuring provisions, of which the ship's crew were really in want, there was not a violation of the navigation act. The evidence in the cause seems to justify the conclusion that her real destination was to New Orleans. The order of Mr. Gold, agent of the owners, to the master, to take command of the vessel and proceed to New Orleans, and there to endeavor to procure a freight to England or the continent; the letter of recommendation from John Guya, merchant, to Messrs. R. D. Shepherd & Co., requesting their aid to the captain to accomplish that purpose, taken in connection with the circumstance of Glover's taking his passage in the vessel, with the leave of the agent, from Margarita to New Orleans, establish the fact in a satisfactory manner. It appears to have been understood, by all who had any concern with the vessel, that her destination was to New Orleans.

The Frances and Eliza did not enter the port of Falmouth, but stood off and on, four or five miles from the harbor, for a few days, during which time the master went on shore to get provisions, of which he was in want. Whether he endeavored to procure freight there, is a fact not ascertained by the testimony. It is certain that he did not obtain it, because it is admitted that the vessel sailed in ballast to New Orleans. His real object in going on shore at Falmouth, appears to have been to procure provisions, of which the ship's crew were much in want. And there is no evidence *of any act done by him, which can be [406] construed into a breach of the act concerning navigation. The policy of that act, without doubt, was to counteract the British colonial system of navigation; to prevent British vessels from bringing British goods from the islands, in exclusion of vessels of the United States, and to place the vessels of the United States on a footing of reciprocity with British vessels. The system of equality was what was aimed at. The landing a passenger there, who usually got employment, and for that reason chose to remain on the island; and the taking in two passengers there, one of which was a boy and a relative, and the other taken, passage free, to New Orleans, are not deemed to be acts in contravention of the true construction of the navigation act.

The log-book was supposed to furnish some suspicious appearances, but, on examination, was found to contain no material fact which could govern in the decision.

It is the unanimous opinion of the court that the sentence of the District Court ought to be reversed, and that the property be restored to the claimant.

THE LUMINARY.

L'AMOUREAUX, Claimant.

A case of forfeiture, under the 27th section of the registry of vessels act, of December 31, 1792, c. 146, for the fraudulent use of a register, by a vessel not actually entitled to the benefit of it.

Where the onus probandi is thrown on the claimant, in an instance or revenue cause, by a prima facie case made out on the part of the prosecutor, and the claimant fails to explain the difficulties of the case by the production of papers and other evidence which must be in his possession, or under his control, condemnation follows from the defects of testimony on the part of the claimant.

THIS cause was argued by Mr. D. B. Ogden for the appellant, and by the Attorney-General for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Story delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a libel for an asserted forfeiture, founded on a violation of the 27th section of the act of 31st of December, 1792, c. 146, concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels.<sup>1</sup> The libel charges that the certificate of registry or record of the schooner, made to one John C. King, as owner, was fraudulently or knowingly used for the said schooner, 408* on a *voyage at and from Baltimore to Cayenne, and at and before her subsequent arrival at New Orleans, she not being entitled to the benefit thereof. The claim put in a denial to the allegation of forfeiture; and upon a hearing in the District Court of Louisiana, a decree of condemnation was pronounced, upon which an appeal has been taken to this court.

The facts of the case are these: The vessel sailed from Baltimore about the first of August, 1820, under the command of a Captain James Smith, having on board a Mr. Desmoland, who was owner of a part of the cargo, and being bound on a voyage to Cayenne. A letter of instructions was delivered to the master by the ostensible owner, John C. King, which, among other things, after stating the voyage and ordering a delivery of the cargo agreeably to the bill of lading, contained the following directions: "Mr. Joseph Desmoland, who goes out in the vessel, will provide you with everything necessary for that purpose. You will, as soon as you are required by this gentleman, deliver to him the schooner Luminary, with her boats, &c., having care to retain in your possession the register, and every other paper. Mr. Desmoland will discharge the crew agreeably to the laws of the United States; and this also you will be careful to see executed, and bring your proof thereof. As to yourself, Mr. Desmoland is to pay you according to agreement, that is to say, your wages due, and two months extra, sixty dollars per month. The remainder of the crew to receive the like pay, that is to say, two 409* months *extra wages." "You will, also, during the whole voyage, abide by, and follow the instructions of Mr. J. Desmoland."

It is difficult to read this letter, and not at once perceive that the voyage of the vessel was to end at Cayenne, and that her master and crew were to be discharged, the register separated from the vessel, and all the usual proceedings had which are contemplated by our laws, where a vessel is transferred or sold in a foreign port.

1.—Which provides "that if any certificate of registry, or record, shall be fraudulently or knowingly used for any ship or vessel not then actually entitled to the benefit thereof, according to the true intent of this act, such ship or vessel shall be forfeited to the United States, with her tackle, apparel and furniture.

The vessel was thenceforth to be under the sole government and direction of Mr. Desmoland, and all authority and control of the former owner was to cease. The question naturally arises, how this could happen. If the vessel was transferred to Mr. Desmoland at Baltimore, it admits of an easy explanation. If she was to be sold by him at Cayenne, for the account of the former owner, as his agent, it would seem more consonant to the ordinary course of business that the instructions should have been conditional, and should have stated the expectation of sale, and have provided for the event of an unsuccessful attempt of this nature. Mr. Desmoland would have been referred to as an agent, for there could be no reason to conceal that agency. At all events, the true nature of the case lies within the privity of King and Desmoland; and they have the full means to explain the transaction, if it be innocent. There must exist in the possession of Mr. Desmoland the documents under which he derived title from King, whatever that title may be; and his silence, after the most ample opportunity for explanation, and for the production *of [410 these papers, affords a strong presumption, that, if produced, they would not aid his cause or prove his innocence.

The schooner arrived at Cayenne, and from thence she was despatched to New Orleans by Mr. Desmoland, under the command of the same master, with the same register, and was entered at New Orleans as an American vessel. Mr. L'Amoureux came on board her at Cayenne, and the laconic instructions given by Mr. Desmoland to the master, for the voyage, were in these words: "I hereby desire Captain James Smith, on his arrival at New Orleans, to deliver the schooner Luminary, with all her tackle, &c., to Francois L'Amoureux, who goes in the said vessel. Cayenne, 1st of October, 1820." At New Orleans, Mr. L'Amoureux claimed the vessel as his own, and desiring to procure for her a new register as an American vessel, he induced the master to execute a bill of sale to him of the schooner, for the sum of $1,000, as agent of King, the former owner. The master, whose testimony is marked by the most studied attempts at evasion, admits that he had no authority from King to execute this bill of sale, that he never received any consideration for it, and that he gave it simply because Mr. Desmoland had given him the instructions above stated. He concludes (and the conclusion seems irresistible, if Mr. L'Amoureux ever obtained title to the property, and she is not now the concealed property of Mr. Desmoland) that he purchased her at Cayenne. Mr. L'Amoureux now claims her from the court as his own property, and as no *other origin is shown to his [411 title, if he have any, it must be referred to a purchase while at that port. In what manner the purchase was made, and how the contract of sale was executed, are not disclosed. Yet the materiality of a full disclosure cannot be denied. If Mr. Desmoland sold in the name, and as agent of King, the bill of sale would show it, and Mr. L'Amoureux would possess it among his muniments of title. If he sold as owner, then he must have become so before the schooner departed from Baltimore, and, of course, the vessel was sailing, during the whole voyage, under a register which she was not entitled to use, and under circumstances which the law prohibited. Why, then, has Mr. L'Amoureux kept from the eyes of the court his title deeds? If they would not prove the justice of the suspicions, which the uncommon circumstances of the case necessarily excite, it seems incredible that they should be suppressed. The suppression, therefore, justifies the court in saying, that the United States have made out a prima facie case, and that the burthen of proof to rebut it rests on the claimant.

But it has been asked, what motive could Mr. Desmoland, or Mr. L'Amoureux, have for this disguise? If no adequate motive could be assigned, it would make it more difficult to account for the extraordinary posture of the case. But as human motives are often inscrutable, the inadequacy of any apparent cause ought not to outweigh very strong circumstantial evidence of a transfer. For if the facts are such that they cannot be accounted for rationally, except 412* upon the supposition of a *sale, there would be equal difficulties in rejecting the inference of that fact. But Mr. Desmoland may have had many motives to conceal the purchase. We do not know his national character, or his private situation. He might have been embarrassed. His national character might have exposed him to capture, or detention, by ships of war. He might have wished to reserve the benefit of selling higher by selling abroad to an American citizen, who could thus re-invest her with the American character. But if Mr. Desmoland were a Frenchman, and meant to carry on a trade with New Orleans, and to preserve the apparent American ownership through the instrumentality of Mr. L'Amoureux (and this is not an unnatural presumption), then he had an adequate motive for the disguise. The act of the 15th of May, 1820, ch. 126, had imposed a very high tonnage duty on French vessels entering the ports of the United States; and as this act was meant as a countervailing measure, to press heavily on French shipping, it was an important object to evade the payment of that duty by sailing under the American flag. Now, Mr. L'Amoureux has not shown any title from Mr. Desmoland, and if he be the confidential agent of the latter, the whole proceeding is just what we should expect with a view to this object. The apparent residence of Mr. Desmoland at Cayenne fortifies this presumption. There would be no absurdity, though there would be illegality, in such conduct. The parties cannot complain, that the court, in a case left so bare 413* of *all reasonable explanation, construe their silence into presumptive guilt.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON dissented. It is not pretended that the evidence in this case makes out any specific offense against this vessel. A number of circumstances are collected into one view, which, as the court do not understand, they consider as sanctioning an inference of guilt, and making out a cause of forfeiture. After giving to these circumstances the utmost weight that can be required, they can be made to amount to no more than the groundwork of a conclusion that the vessel had been sold to Desmoland at Baltimore, or L'Amoureux at Cayenne, and had afterwards sailed under her original American register.

Argumenti gratia, I will concede either fact; Wheat. 8.

and yet I maintain that this vessel cannot be condemned, either under the libel in its present form, or under the facts thus assumed.

It will be observed that there is no evidence whatever in the record relative to the national character of these individuals; or, if any, it goes to show that L'Amoureux was an American citizen. Now, it is certain that they must come within the description of citizens or aliens. But if citizens, the offense of owning a vessel, and not changing her register, is no cause of forfeiture; the 14th section of this act expressly imposes a pecuniary penalty for this offense. In order, then, to maintain this forfeiture, it became indispensable that these individuals, or at least one of them, *should have been 414 made out in evidence to be an alien. No such fact is proved; and this alone is fatal to the purposes of this libel. Both facts, that of being an alien, and that of using the American register, must concur, in order to make out the offense.

2. But had the fact been established in evidence that one of these individuals was an alien, or even both of them, still I maintain that this condemnation ought to be reversed.

This libel, it will be observed, is preferred expressly under the provisions of the twenty-seventh section of the registering act. By that section it is enacted that "if any certificate of registry or record shall be fraudulently and knowingly used for any ship or vessel not then actually entitled to the benefit thereof, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, such ship or vessel shall be forfeited to the United States, with her tackle, apparel and furniture." The offense, as laid in the libel, is "that at and after the departure of this vessel on a voyage, on which, on or before the 1st day of August last, she sailed from the port of Baltimore to Cayenne, and at and before her subsequent arrival at New Orleans, from Cayenne aforesaid, which was, &c., a certain certificate of registry or record thereof, made and delivered in pursuance of an act of Congress, entitled, an act, &c., to a certain John C. King, of the city of Baltimore aforesaid, mariner, as the owner thereof, was fraudulently or knowingly used for the said vessel, she not then being, to wit, &c., actually entitled *to the benefit 415 thereof according to the true intent of the said act."

To the decree of forfeiture, founded upon this libel, I entertain two objections, either of which is fatal. In the first place, the forfeiture made out in evidence is not one comprised within this 27th section. If Desmoland and L'Amoureux were American citizens, it has already been shown that no forfeiture attaches; but whether they be citizens or aliens, there exist in this act express provisions, by distinct sections, that embrace their cases. The 14th section relates to the case of an American citizen, and the 16th section to that of an alien or foreigner who shall cover his interest by an existing register, after a transfer of property in the vessel.

I cannot imagine upon what principle this libel can be maintained under the provisions of the 27th section, when the evidence brings the vessel directly within the 14th or 16th section, if it brings her within the penalties of the law at all. If the answer be, that although the case of this vessel be specifically legislated upon in distinct sections, yet the 27th will cover the same ground and she may be libeled under either, my answer is, that the conclusion of law is directly the reverse. I ask no other evidence to show that this case was not intended to be comprised within the 27th section, than the fact that in another section of the same act, the case is specifically provided for. And such is unquestionably the truth. The 27th section was not intended to embrace the two offenses specifically provided for in the 14th and 16th 416* sections. *These two sections create two substantive offenses, one or the other, or both of which, has been committed in this case, or no offense has been committed. Those offenses can arise only upon the event of a sale by the owner of a ship; but the registers of vessels that have been condemned, or captured, or wrecked, or otherwise destroyed, may be fraudulently used to cover other vessels of corresponding built; and these, and various other unidentified offenses, are those against which the 27th section was intended to operate.

And this leads me to my second objection to sustaining the condemnation under the allegations in this libel.

The allegations are too vague and general, and I would as soon sustain an indictment for piracy or murder, without any specific allegations, as a libel in which the offense is not set forth with such convenient certainty as to put the claimant on his defense. It is true that the same technical niceties are not necessary in a libel, as the wary precision of the common law requires in indictments; and the rule, as usually laid down, is generally correct, viz., that the offense may be laid in the words of the act. But it is obvious that this rule can only apply to those laws which create a substantive offense, not those which generalize and create offenses by classes. In the case before us, the offense created by either the 14th or 16th section of this law, may well be laid in the words of the law; each describes but one offense, and that must invariably be the same. Not so with the 27th section; under it, especially after the 417* present *decision, a variety of offenses may be comprised, distinguishable both into classes and individuals. There cannot be a more striking illustration of these remarks, than that which this case presents; had the libel counted upon the 14th or 16th section, instead of the 27th, the claimant might, perhaps, have been prepared to meet those specific charges in a manner which would have explained those supposed ambiguities which have now proved fatal to him.

These observations have been made under the admission that the evidence in the cause countenanced the conclusion that a sale of this vessel had taken place before she left Baltimore. If she was not sold until she reached Cayenne, and was then sold, deliverable in New Orleans, there has been no offense committed. And even if sold to L'Amoureux, an American citizen, it was no cause of forfeiture. And this, I think, the evidence fully establishes.

There is one fact in the cause which must put down the idea of her having been sold before she left Baltimore. She took in a cargo at that place, and Desmoland was one of the shippers. Smith, whose testimony I see no just ground for impeaching, expressly swears that the freight of this outward voyage was paid at Baltimore, to King, the American owner. Why he should receive, and Desmoland pay, the freight of this voyage, after she became the property of the latter, it is difficult to discover. Nor is it less difficult to imagine what purpose it would have answered for her to retain her original character on a voyage to Cayenne, *upon the supposition that she had be- 418 come the property of a Frenchman. Nothing but heavy duties and alien disabilities could have resulted from it. So far from having a motive to retain the original American character, his interests would have dictated exactly the reverse. If a contract of sale did take place in Baltimore, the vessel deliverable in Cayenne, this was no offense against the registering act; the American citizen was entitled to use the American character to facilitate the sale; or enhance the price of his vessel, by a contract to deliver her at a particular port.

But it has been argued that by assuming the fact of the sale to Desmoland at Baltimore, all the evidence in the cause may be explained with consistency.

I have already stated some facts, from which I infer directly the reverse; facts which appear to me altogether inconsistent with the idea of a sale at Baltimore. But let it be admitted that such a consequence would follow from this hypothesis, and it is still necessary to go farther. No innocent solution of these supposed difficulties ought to be practicable, before the inference of guilt can fasten upon this vessel. Yet the most rational and simple solution of every difficulty will be found in another hypothesis, altogether innocent and probable. Let it be supposed that Desmoland was the agent of King, for the sale of this vessel at Cayenne, and every fact in the case will be fully reconciled with the idea of King's interest having still remained in him. It was, of course, that on a sale taking place at Cayenne, the captain *should deliver her up to Desmoland's 419 order. That she was then to put off her American character is proved by the instructions to Smith to bring back the register; and as the captain and his crew would then be left to find their way home from a distant country, they were to receive two months extra wages.

I see nothing in all this but consistency and fairness. Everything shows that she was not to continue trading under her American character; and yet the prosecution of such an intent, and of such an intent alone, would have comported with the fraud now imputed to her, to wit, that of evading the newly-imposed tonnage duty on French vessels.

With regard to the supposed transfer to L'Amoureux, at Cayenne, I consider him as acknowledged in the record to be an American citizen; and I have already shown that an actual sale to him at Cayenne would not subject the vessel to forfeiture for making the voyage to New Orleans under her original register. It was impossible that he could take out a new register at Cayenne; and the apprehension of incurring some penalty or forfeiture would naturally suggest the measure, which Smith supposes was adopted, of purchasing under a stipulation to deliver the vessel at New Orleans. In the choice between guilt and innocence, it is the construction which he has a right to expect a court of justice will give of his conduct.

Nor can I perceive how any unfavorable inference can be drawn from the circumstance of 420* *Smith's signing the bill of sale at New Orleans. It is obvious that King expected to sell the vessel in Cayenne, and to separate her thus from the American marine. There was, therefore, no order taken for effecting that formal transfer which was necessary, under our laws, for the purpose of perpetuating her American character. I see no reason why we should not rather suppose these men ignorant than fraudulent. They were imposing upon no one; and if the collector could be induced to issue a new register, upon Smith's bill of sale, it was all that L'Amoureux stood in need of, since King's letter to Smith, and Desmoland's order to deliver the vessel, were sufficient muniments of title, against all the rights of King. I see nothing but fairness in the transaction; and the necessities of L'Amoureux's business may have well rendered it inconvenient to wait until King could transmit a regular power of attorney from Baltimore.

It is asked, why did not Desmoland and others come forward with evidence to explain all these transactions? I confess it appears to me that the record supplies the answer. They could not have had a serious apprehension of the fate they have met with. It is enough for them to prove themselves innocent, after evidence of fraud has been produced against them. Thinking, as I clearly do, that upon the evidence before the court they were entitled to a decree in their favor, I cannot perceive that any further explanation of their conduct ought to have been required.

There was no sufficient allegation in the libel; 421* *no evidence of a sale to Desmoland; none of his alien character, if there had been a sale to him; the sale to L'Amoureux did not subject her to forfeiture; and not a fact had been made out in evidence which was not even more reconcilable with a state of innocence than a state of guilt.

I confess I think it a hard case.

[CHANCERY. TRUST. JURISDICTION.]

v.

MARY WORMLEY, Wife of Hugh Wallace Wormley, by GEORGE F. STROTHER, her next friend, and JOHN S. WORMLEY, MARY W. WORMLEY, JANE B. WORMLEY, and ANNE B. WORMLEY, infant children of the said MARY and HUGH WALLACE, by the said STROTHER, their next friend, Respondents.

A trustee cannot purchase, or acquire by exchange, the trust property.

Where the trustee in a marriage settlement has a power to sell, and re-invest the trust property, whenever, in his opinion, the purchase money may be laid out advantageously for the cestui que trusts, that opinion must be fairly and honestly exercised, and the sale will be void where he appears to have been influenced by private and selfish interests, and the sale is for an inadequate price.

Quære, How far a bonæ fidei purchaser, without notice of the breach *ot trust, in such a case, [*422] is bound to see to the application of the purchase money.

Where the purchase money is to be re-invested upon trusts that require time and discretion, or the acts of sale and re-investment are contemplated to be at a distance from each other, the purchaser is not bound to look to the application of the purchase money.

But wherever the purchaser is affected with notice of the facts, which in law constitute the breach of trust, the sale is void as to him; and a mere general denial of all knowledge of fraud will not avail him if the transaction is such as a court of equity cannot sanction.

A bonæ fidei purchaser, without notice, to be entitled to protection, must be so, not only at the time of the contract or conveyance, but until the purchase money is actually paid.

This court will not suffer its jurisdiction, in an equity cause, to be ousted, by the circumstance of the joinder or non-joinder of merely formal parties, who are not entitled to sue, or liable to be sued, in the United States courts.

A sale of trust property under a judgment or decree of which the cestui que trust had no notice, and which was procured by fraudulent collusion with the trustee, does not conclude the cestui que trust from asserting his title to the property against the trustee or any purchaser with notice. Oliver v. Platt, 3 How. 333, 407; affirming S. C. 3 McLean, 27; Baker v. Root, 4 McLean, 572.

Wherever one party purchases property by direction of another, he is deemed to purchase as a suing by their next friend, against the appellant, Hugh W. Wormley, her husband, Thomas Strode, as trustee, Richard Veitch, as original purchaser, and David Castleman and Charles McCormick, as mesne purchasers from Veitch of the trust property, for the purpose of enforcing the trusts of a marriage settlement, and obtaining an account, and other equitable relief. The bill charged the sale to have been a breach of the trusts, and that the purchasers had notice.

In contemplation of a marriage between Hugh W. Wormley and Mary Wormley (then Strode), an indenture of three parts was executed on the 5th of August, 1807, by way of marriage settlement, to which the husband and wife, and Thomas Strode, her brother, as trustee, were 423*] parties. *The indenture, after reciting the intended marriage, in case it shall take effect, and in bar of dower and jointure, &c., &c., conveys all the real and personal estate held by Hugh W. Wormley, under a certain indenture specified in the deed, as his paternal inheritance, to Thomas Strode, in fee, upon the following trusts, viz., "for the use, benefit and emolument of the said Mary and her children, if any she have, until the decease of her intended husband, and then, if she should be the longest liver, until the children should respectively arrive at legal maturity, at which time each individual of them is to receive his equal dividend, &c., leaving at least one full third part of the estate, &c., in her possession, for and during her natural life; then, on her decease, the landed part of the said one-third to be divided among the children, &c., and the personal property, &c., according to the will, &c., of the said Mary, at her decease. But if the said Mary should depart this life before the decease of the said Hugh W. Wormley, then he is to enjoy the whole benefits, emoluments and profits, during his natural life, then to be divided amongst said W.'s children, as he by will shall see cause to direct, and then this trust, so far as relates to T. Strode, to end, &c.; and so, in like manner, should the said Mary depart this life without issue, then this trust to end, &c. But should Wormley depart this life before the said Mary, and leave no issue, then the said Mary to have and enjoy the whole of said estate for and during her natural *life, and then to descend to the heirs of the said W., or as his will relative thereto may provide."

Then follows this clause: "And it is further covenanted, &c., that whenever, in the opinion of the said Thomas Strode, the said landed property can be sold and conveyed, and the money arising from the sale thereof be laid out in the purchase of other lands, advantageously for those concerned and interested therein, that then, and in that case, the said Thomas Strode is hereby authorized, &c., to sell, and by proper deeds of writing to convey the same; and the lands so purchased shall be in every respect subject to all the provisions, uses, trusts and contingencies, as those were by him sold and conveyed. And it is further understood by the parties, that the said H. W. W., under leave of the said Thomas Strode, his heirs and assigns, shall occupy and enjoy the hereby conveyed estate, real and personal, and the issues and profits thereof, for and during the term of his natural life, and after that, the said estate to be divided agreeably to the foregoing contingencies."

The property conveyed by the indenture consisted of about 350 acres of land, situate in Frederick county, in Virginia. The marriage took effect, and there are now four children by the marriage. For a short time after the marriage, Wormley and his wife resided on the Frederick lands; and a negotiation was then entered into by Wormley and the trustee, for the exchange of the Frederick lands for lands of the trustee, in the county of Fauquier. Various reasons were suggested *for this [425 exchange, the wishes of friends, the proximity to the trustee and the other relations for the wife and the superior accommodations of the family of Wormley. The negotiation took effect; but no deed of conveyance or covenant of agreement, recognizing the exchange, was ever made by Wormley; and no conveyance of any sort, or declaration of trust, substituting the Fauquier lands for those in the marriage settlement, was ever executed by the trustee. Wormley and his family, however, removed to the Fauquier lands, and resided on them for some time. During this residence, viz., on the 16th of September, 1810, the trustee sold the Frederick lands by an indenture, to the defendant, Veitch, for the sum of five thousand five hundred dollars; and to this conveyance Wormley, for the purpose of signifying his approbation of the sale, became a party. The circumstances of this transaction were as follows: The trustee had become the owner of a tract of land in Culpeper county, in Virginia, subject to a mortgage to Veitch and one Thompson, upon which more than $3,000 were then due, and a foreclosure had taken place. To discharge this debt, and relieve the Culpeper estate, was a leading object of the sale, and so much of the trust money as was necessary for the extinguishment of this debt, was applied for this purpose. At the same time, Strode, as collateral security to Veitch for the performance of the covenant of trustee for the other, upon the payment of any money advanced in making the purchase. Rothwell v. Dewees, 2 Black. 613; Baker v. Whiting, 3 Sumn. 475; Phillips v. Crammond, 2 Wash. C. C. 441.

general warranty contained in the indenture, executed a mortgage upon the Fauquier lands, then in the possession of Wormley. In 426* 1811, Veitch conveyed the Frederick lands to the defendants, Castleman and M'Cormick, for a large pecuniary consideration, in pursuance of a previous agreement, and by the same deed made an equitable assignment of the mortgage on the Fauquier lands. About this time, Wormley having become dissatisfied with the Fauquier lands, a negotiation took place for his removal to some lands of the trustee in Kentucky; and upon that occasion a conditional agreement was entered into between the trustee and Wormley, for the purchase of a part of the Kentucky lands, in lieu of the Fauquier lands, at a stipulated price, if Wormley should, after his removal there, be satisfied with them. Wormley accordingly removed to Kentucky with his family; but becoming dissatisfied with the Kentucky lands, the agreement was never carried into effect. Afterwards, in April, 1813, Castleman and M'Cormick, by deed, released the mortgage on the Fauquier lands, in consideration that Veitch would enter into a general covenant of warranty to them of the Frederick lands; and on the same day the trustee executed a deed of trust to one Daniel Lee, subjecting the Kentucky lands to a lien as security for the warranty in the conveyance of the Frederick lands, and subject to that lien, to the trusts of the marriage settlement, if Wormley should accept these lands, reserving, however, to himself, a right to substitute any other lands upon which to charge the trusts of the marriage settlement. At this period the dissatisfaction of Wormley was known to all the parties, and Wormley was neither a party, nor assented to 427* the deed, and Castleman and M'Cormick had not paid the purchase money. In August, 1813, the trustee sold the Fauquier lands to certain persons by the name of Grimmer and Mundell, without making any other provision for the trusts of the marriage settlement.

At the hearing, the court below pronounced a decree declaring "that the exchange of land made between the defendants, Hugh W. Wormley and Thomas Strode, is not valid in equity, and that the defendant, Thomas Strode, has committed a breach of trust in selling the land conveyed to him by the deed of the 5th of August, 1807, for purposes not warranted by that deed, in misapplying the money produced by the said sale, and in failing to settle other lands to the same trusts as were created by the said deed; and that the defendants, Richard Veitch, David Castleman, and Charles M'Cormick, are purchasers with notice of the facts which constitute the breach of trust committed by the said Thomas Strode, and are, therefore, in equity, considered as trustees; and that the defendants, David Castleman and Charles M'Cormick, do hold the land conveyed, &c., charged with the trusts in the said deed mentioned, until a court of equity shall decree a conveyance thereof. The court is further of opinion that the said defendants are severally accountable for the rents and profits arising out of the said trust property while in possession thereof, and that the said defendants, Castleman and M'Cormick, are entitled to the amount of the incumbrances from which the land has been relieved by any of *the defendants, and of the value of the 428 permanent improvements made thereon, and of the advances which have been made to the said Hugh Wallace Wormley by any of the defendants, for the support of his family; the said advances to be credited against the rents and profits, and the value of the said permanent improvements, and of the incumbrances which have been discharged, and which may not be abated by the rents and profits, to be charged on the land itself; and it is referred to one of the commissioners of the court to take accounts according to their directions, and report," &c.

The court, afterwards, partially confirmed the report which had been made, reserving some questions for its future decision: "And it being represented on the part of the plaintiffs that they have removed to the state of Kentucky, and are about removing to the state of Mississippi, and that it will be highly advantageous to them to sell the trust estate, and to invest the proceeds of sale in other lands in the state of Mississippi to the uses and trusts expressed in the deed of August 5th, 1807; and it appearing, also, that there is no fund other than the trust estate from which the sum due to the defendants, Castleman and M'Cormick, can be drawn, this court is further of opinion that the said trust estate ought to be sold, and the proceeds of sale, after paying the sum due to the defendants, Castleman and M'Cormick, invested in other lands in the state of Mississippi, to the same uses and trusts," &c. The sale, therefore, was decreed; commissioners were appointed to make it; the 429 proceeds to be first applied in satisfaction of the sums found due by the commissioner's report, and the balance to be paid to the trustee, to be invested by him in lands lying in Mississippi, "for which he shall take a conveyance to himself in trust, for the uses and trusts expressed in the deed of 5th of August, 1807, &c., and the court being of opinion that Thomas Strode is an unfit person to remain the trustee of the plaintiff, doth further order, that he shall no longer act in that character," &c., and proceed to appoint another in his stead, of whom bond and surety was required.

So much of this last decretal order as directs a sale of the property therein mentioned, was suspended until the further order of the court, "unless the said David Castleman and Charles M'Cormick shall sign and deliver to the marshal, or his deputy, who is directed to make the said sale, an instrument of writing, declaring that should the decree rendered in this cause be reversed in whole or in part, they will not claim restitution of the lands sold, but will consent to receive in lieu thereof the money for which the same may be sold; which instrument of writing the marshal is directed to receive, and to file among the papers in the cause in this court."

So much of the decretal order as directs the land to be sold to the highest bidder, was subsequently set aside, and until the appointment of a trustee, the marshal directed to receive propositions for the land, and to report the same to the court, which would give such further directions respecting the sale of the said land as shall then appear 430 proper. Whereupon, the defendants appealed from all the decrees pronounced in the cause.

Mr. Jones, for the appellants, argued, 1. That in point of fact, all the arrangements of the trustee for exchanging and disposing of the trust estate, were not only fair and honest, but a discreet exercise of his authority; highly beneficial to the cestui que trusts, and entirely to their advantage.

2. That whether they were so or not was no concern of the purchasers under the trustee; he being invested, by the terms of the trust, with a clear discretion, which invited all the world to treat with him, as with one having a complete authority to act upon his own opinion of what was discreet and expedient in the administration of the trust, and not as with one executing a defined duty or authority, either purely ministerial, or mixed with a limited discretion over the subordinate details.

3. That the selling of the trust estate, and the investing of the proceeds, were, in their nature, and by the terms of the deed, to be two distinct substantive acts in the exercise of the discretionary authority vested in the trustee; and were not to be done uno flatu; therefore, the purchaser claiming a title under one consummate act in the exercise of that discretion, was not responsible for any subsequent indiscretion or fraud of the trustee, in the progressive execution of the trust. Wherever the deed confers an immediate power of sale, for a purpose which cannot be immediately defined and ascertained, but must be postponed for any 431*] *period of time, however short, the purchaser is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money.<sup>1</sup> It is observed by Sir W. Grant, master of the rolls, that the doctrine, binding the purchaser to see to the application of the money, has been carried farther than any sound equitable principle will warrant.<sup>2</sup> But it has never been extended to a case like the present, where the mode in which the money is to be invested depends upon a variety of contingent and complicated circumstances, which are submitted to the judgment and discretion of the trustee. Where the trust is to pay debts and legacies, the purchaser is discharged by payment to a trustee.<sup>3</sup>

But it might, perhaps, be said that the authority to sell is combined with that to apply the proceeds. But he contended that they were entirely independent and unconnected. They might indeed be associated in the mind of the trustee, but that remaining a secret in his breast could not affect an innocent purchaser with the consequences of any subsequent error or fraud of the trustee. Where, indeed, the cestui que trust is no party to the sale, nor to the original deed creating the trust, there may be more room for the application of the doctrine, as to the purchaser seeing to the application of the money. Such are deeds of assignment for the payment of debts, in which the creditors are frequently not, originally, parties. *And in the case cited, the master of the rolls says that the circumstance of the creditors coming in and executing the deed, consummates the authority of the trustee, to give a valid discharge for the purchase money of an estate sold by him.<sup>4</sup> But here the cestui que trusts are not only parties to the deed creating the trust, but assenting to the very transaction now complained of.

4. So that if the mere discretion of the trustee be not competent, per se, strictly to justify the purchasers under him, and to protect their title, still the peculiar circumstances of this case give them a superinduced equity against the claims of the cestui que trusts. 1st. The previous consultation and deliberate approbation of the respective parents, and other disinterested friends of such of the cestui que trusts as were sui juris. 2d. The agency of those who were sui juris, in soliciting and recommending the measure in question, their active co-operation in it, and their subsequent acquiescence. 3d. The approbation of the parents of such of the cestui que trusts as were not sui juris. These circumstances would have afforded sufficient evidence of the expediency of the measure, to have induced a court of chancery, upon the application of the parties, to have sanctioned and directed it. Consequently, all the present plaintiffs are divested of every pretension to equitable relief; and so far as the claim is urged for the advantage of those who were sui juris, and who, by their active co-operation and implicit acquiescence encouraged *and promoted the sale, it [433 must be repudiated by the court as inequitable and unconscientious. Wormley and wife were the efficient cestui que trusts. The equitable proprietary interest was in them. They were both sui juris. A married woman is considered as a feme sole as to property settled to her use, whether in possession or reversion, and she may dispose of it, unless particularly restrained by the terms of the settlement.<sup>5</sup>

There is no such universal, inflexible rule, as that the trustee cannot change the trust estate.<sup>6</sup>

If he had a discretionary power, it signifies not how the payment was made, and whether a credit was given or not. Nor is this such a purchase, by the trustee himself, as will invalidate the sale in respect to bonæ fidei purchasers.<sup>7</sup> It is not a sale by himself to himself. He does not unite both the characters of vendor and vendee, and, therefore, it does not involve the mischiefs meant to be corrected by the rule. The consent of the cestui que trusts who are sui juris, confirms the sale, at least as to these innocent purchasers.

5. But if all these positions should be overruled, *he insisted that the decree of [434 the court below was erroneous in its details; because it should, in the first instance, have decreed, as against the trustee himself, an execution of the trust; and in the alternative of his failure and inability, the repayment of the purchase money by Veitch, the original purchaser from the trustee; and the land in the hands of the appellants, Castleman and M'Cormick, who were purchasers with a general warranty from

Veitch, as he was from the trustee, should have been the last resource, after the others had been exhausted; and then only to raise the money due, giving Castleman and McCormick an option to retain the land by paying the money, instead of decreeing the land to be sold at all events for the benefit of the cestui que trusts. The appellants ought not to have been held to account for the mesne profits, because Wormley, the only person yet entitled to receive them, was a party to the sale, and was clearly competent to alien the estate, and the rents and profits, during his life, he being sole cestui que trust for life; and thus, if the sale is to be set aside at all for the benefit of his wife and children, it can only be to the extent of protecting and securing their future and contingent interests.

6. He also contended that the bill must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Wormley, the husband, is made a party defendant, though he is a citizen of the same state with his wife and infant children, who are plaintiffs.<sup>1</sup>

435*] *The Attorney-General, contra, argued, 1. That the trustee had broken every one of the trusts he had undertaken to perform, on assuming the fiduciary character. If he, therefore, were now in the actual possession of the Frederick lands, if he had conveyed them, and taken back a reconveyance to his own use, there could be no question that a court of equity would hold these lands in his possession subject to the original trusts. But if the appellants purchased with knowledge of the trusts, and of the breach of trusts, equity converts them into trustees, with all the liabilities of the original trustee.<sup>2</sup> He argued upon the facts to show that they were chargeable with this knowledge. Although they had denied, in the answer, all fraud on their own part, and all knowledge of fraud in others, yet they do not deny a knowledge of such facts as affects them with the consequences of the trustee's misconduct.

2. It may be laid down as a general proposition, that trustees are incapable of becoming the purchasers of the trust subject. The two characters of buyer and seller are inconsistent. Emptor emit quam minimo potest, venditor vendit quam maximo potest.<sup>3</sup> Where the trust is for persons not sui juris, as femes covert, infants, and the like, the court will, under no circumstances whatever, be they ever so fair between the parties (as consulting friends, &c.), confirm 436*] a purchase of the *trust property by the trustee, unless it be done under the immediate authority and sanction of the court.<sup>4</sup> It cannot be established even by a sale at public auction, or before a master.<sup>5</sup> The only mode in which it can be done, is by a previous decree of permission, which the court will not grant, unless where it is clearly for the benefit of the cestui que trust.<sup>6</sup> A sale made without such permission, may, or may not, be confirmed, at the option of the cestui que trust.<sup>7</sup> And in order to set aside a purchase by a trustee, it is not necessary to show that he has made any advantage by his purchase.<sup>8</sup> But the whole of this subject has been so thoroughly examined by Mr. Chancellor Kent, in several cases determined by him, that it is unnecessary to do more than to give the court a general reference to the authorities cited by him.<sup>9</sup> The rule is applicable with peculiar force to the present case, because here the purchase was not under the sanction of the Court, nor at a master's sale, nor at auction, where the trustee resists a fair competition; there was no payment of the purchase money to the use of any of the cestuis que trust; and (if we were bound to show that the trustee has made an advantage) he has made all *the advant- [437 age. If Strode had been a trustee merely for the purpose of sale, he could not have acquired the trust fund by purchase. But his was not a mere power to sell; it was a power to sell, whenever he could, in his honest opinion, invest the proceeds of the sale advantageously in other lands, to be settled to the same uses. The sale, without a re-investment, was a breach of trust. Those who purchased under him had notice of the breach of trust.

3. The general principle is that a purchaser from a trustee is bound to see to the application of the purchase money. But that principle is stated with this limitation, that he is only thus bound where the trust is of a defined and limited nature, and not where it is general and unlimited, as a trust for the payment of debts generally.<sup>10</sup> That is, if the trust be of such a nature that the purchaser may reasonably be expected to see to the application of the purchase money, as if it be for the payment of legacies, or of debts which are scheduled or specified, the purchaser is bound to see that the money is applied accordingly; and that, although the estate be sold under a decree of a court of equity, or by virtue of an act of Parliament.<sup>11</sup> And Mr. Sugden says that those most strongly disposed to narrow this rule, do still hold that where the act is a breach of duty in the trustee, it is very fit that those who deal with him should be affected by an act tending to defeat the *trust of which they have [438 notice.<sup>12</sup> This is what Sir W. Grant says, in the case cited on the other side, with this addition, that "where the sale is made by the trustee, in performance of his duty, it seems extraordinary that he should not be able to do what one should think incidental to the right exercise of his power; that is, to give a valid discharge for the purchase money."<sup>13</sup> But here the sale was made, not in performance of the trustee's duty, but in violation of it; and the supposed assent of the husband and wife, to the breach of trust, will not cure it.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

Such is the general outline of the case; and in the progress of the investigation, it may become necessary to advert to some other facts with more particularity.

And the first question arising upon this posture of the case is, whether Strode, the trustee, by the sale to Veitch, has been guilty of any breach of trust. And this seems to the court to be scarcely capable of controversy. That there are circumstances in the case which raise a presumption of bad faith on the part of the trustee, and expose him to some suspicion, cannot escape observation. But assuming him to 439* have acted with *entire good faith, his proceedings were a plain departure from his duty. In respect to the supposed exchange of the Fauquier for the Frederick lands, it is impossible for a moment to admit its validity. In the first place, it was not made between parties competent to make it. Wormley had no authority over the estate, after the marriage settlement. The chief object of that settlement was to secure the property to the use of the wife and children, during the joint lives of the husband and wife. And though it is said, in another part of the deed, that Wormley shall occupy and enjoy the estate, and the issues and profits thereof, during his life, yet this was to be under leave of the trustee; and to suppose that he thus acquired an equitable interest for life, is to defeat the manifest and direct intention of the other clauses in the deed, which avow the whole object to be the security of the estate, during the same period, for the use of the wife and children. The true and natural construction of this clause is, that it points to the discretion which the trustee may exercise, as to allowing the husband to occupy the estate, and take the profits for the maintenance of the family, whenever the trustee perceives it may be safely done, without involving the trustee in any responsibility, to which he might be exposed, by such a permission, without such an authority. But, at all events, the right to dispose of the equitable fee to any one, much less to the trustee himself, did not exist in Wormley; and any exchange attempted to be made by him, however beneficial, would have been utterly void. But no 440* *exchange was in fact consummated. It is true, that the removal of the Fauquier lands took place upon an agreement to this effect; but no definitive conveyance was ever made; and the trustee himself never settled, and never took a step towards settling, the Fauquier estate upon the trusts of the marriage settlement, as it was his indispensable duty to do if he meant to conduct himself correctly. As to the substituted Kentucky lands, the transaction was still more delusive. The agreement for the substitution was merely conditional, depending upon the subsequent election of Wormley, and his dissent put an end to it.

As to the conveyance to Lee, ostensibly for the trusts of the settlement, it can be viewed in no other light than an attempt to cover up the most unjustifiable proceedings. That conveyance was not executed until after the dissent and dissatisfaction of Wormley were well known; and so far from its containing any valid performance of the trusts, it expressly gives a prior lien to the purchasers of the Frederick lands as security for their covenant of warranty; and to complete the delusion, the trustee reserved to himself the authority to substitute any other lands, leaving the trusts to float along, without fixing them definitively upon any solid foundation. If we add that the Fauquier lands were mortgaged to the purchasers for the same covenant, and that this mortgage was discharged only for the purpose of selling the property to Grimmer and Mundell, we shall come irresistibly to the conclusion that the trustee never was in a situation *to give an unencumbered title on either [*441 the Fauquier or Kentucky lands, to secure the trusts; and that if he was, he never in fact executed any conveyance for this purpose. In every view, therefore, of this part of the case, it is clear that no valid exchange did, or could take place; and that as there was no equitable or legal transmutation of the property from the cestuis que trust, it remained in the trustee, clothed with all the original fiduciary interests.

But, independent of these considerations, there is a stubborn rule of equity, founded upon the most solid reasoning, and supported by public policy, which forbade any such exchange. No rule is better settled than that a trustee cannot become a purchaser of the trust estate. He cannot be at once vendor and vendee. He cannot represent in himself two opposite and conflicting interests. As vendor he must always desire to sell as high, and as purchaser to buy as low, as possible; and the law has wisely prohibited any person from assuming such dangerous and incompatible characters. If there be any exceptions to the generality of the rule, they are not such as can affect the present case. On the contrary, if there be any cogency in the rule itself, this is a strong case for its application; for, by the very terms of the settlement, the trustee was invested with a large discretion, and a peculiar and exclusive confidence was placed in his judgment. Of necessity, therefore, it was contemplated that his judgment should be free and impartial, and unbiassed by personal interests. The asserted exchange, *so far at least as it [*442 affects to justify or confirm the proceedings of the trustee, may, therefore, be at once laid out of the question.

Then, was the sale to Veitch a breach of trust? The power given to the trustee by the settlement is certainly very broad and unusual in its terms; but it is not unlimited. The trustee had not an unrestricted authority to sell, but only when, in his opinion, the purchase money might be laid out advantageously for the cestuis que trust. It is true, the sale and re-investment are to be decided by his opinion, which is an invisible operation of the mind. But his acts, nevertheless, are subject to the scrutiny of the law; and if that opinion has not been fairly and honestly exercised, if it has been swayed by private interests and selfish objects; if the sale has been at a price utterly disproportionate to the real value of the property, and the evidence demonstrate such facts, a court of equity will not sanction an act which thus becomes a fraud upon innocent parties.

Much ingenuity has been exercised in a critical examination of the nature of the power itself, as it stands in the text of the settlement. It is contended that the acts of sale, and of re-investment, are separate and distinct acts, and the power to sell is, therefore, to be disjoined from that of repurchase, so that the sale may be good, though the purchase money should be misapplied. How far a bonæ fidei purchaser is bound, in a case like the present, to look to the application of the purchase money, need not be decided in this case. There is much reason 443* in the doctrine that where the *trust is defined in its object, and the purchase money is to be re-invested upon trusts which require time and discretion, or the acts of sale and re-investment are manifestly contemplated to be at a distance from each other, the purchaser shall not be bound to look to the application of the purchase money; for the trustee is clothed with a discretion in the management of the trust fund, and if any persons are to suffer by his misconduct, it should be rather those who have reposed confidence, than those who have bought under an apparently authorized act. But, in the present case, it seems difficult to separate the acts from each other. The sale is not to be made unless a re-investment can, in the opinion of the trustee, be advantageously made. He is not to sell upon mere general speculation, but for the purpose of direct re-investment. And it is very difficult to perceive how the trustee could arrive at the conclusion that it was proper to sell, unless he had, at the same time, fixed on some definite re-investment, which, compared with the former estate, would be advantageous to the parties. Although, therefore, the acts of sale, and purchase, are to be distinct, they are connected with each other; and, at least as to the trustee, there cannot be an exercise of opinion, such as the trust contemplated, unless he had viewed them in connection. If he should sell without having any settled intention to buy, leaving that to be governed by future events, he would certainly violate the confidence reposed in him. A fortiori, if he should sell with an intention not to re-invest, but to speculate 444* late, for the *purpose of relieving his own necessities, or of appropriating the trust fund indefinitely to his own uses.

Now, in point of fact, what has the trustee done in this case? He has sold the trust property to pay his own debts. He has never applied the proceeds to any re-investment. To this very hour there has been no just and fair application of the purchase money. The Fauquier lands are gone; the Kentucky lands have been rejected and are loaded with liens; and there is nothing left but the personal responsibility of the trustee, embarrassed and distressed as he must be taken to be, unless the trusts are still fastened to the Frederick lands. Can it, then, be contended for a moment that there is no breach of trust, when the sale was not for the purposes of re-investment? When the party puts his right to sell, not upon an honest exercise of opinion at the time of sale, but upon a distinct anterior transaction, invalid and incomplete, by which he became clothed with the beneficial interests of the estate? When he claims to be, not the disinterested trustee, selling the estate, but the trustee purchasing by exchange the trust fund, and thus entitled to deal with it according to his own discretion, and for his own private accommodation, as absolute owner? Where the purchase money is to be applied to extinguish his own debts; and there is no proof of his means to replenish, or acquire an equal sum from other sources? In the judgment of the court, the sale was a manifest breach of trust. It was in no proper sense an execution of the power. The power, in the *contemplation of the trustee, was [*445] virtually extinguished. He sold, not because he intended an advantageous re-investment, but because he considered himself the real owner of the estate. The very letter, as well as the spirit of the power, was therefore violated, for the trustee never exercised an opinion upon that which was the sole object of the power to sell—an advantageous re-investment.

The next point for consideration is, whether the defendants, Veitch, and Castleman and M'Cormick, were bonæ fidei purchasers of the Frederick lands, without notice of the breach of trust. If they had notice of the facts, they are necessarily affected with notice of the law operating upon those facts; and their general denial of all knowledge of fraud will not help them, if, in point of law, the transaction is repudiated by a court of equity. If they were bonæ fidei purchasers, without notice, their title might have required a very different consideration.

And first, as to Veitch. The deed to him contained a recital of the marriage settlement, and the power authorizing the sale. He, therefore, had direct and positive notice of the title of the trustee to the property. There is the strongest reason to believe that he was fully cognizant of the exchange of the Frederick and Fauquier lands, negotiated between Wormley and the trustee. The certificate from Wormley, respecting the exchange, and expressing satisfaction with it, which was procured a few days before the sale, and which Veitch now produces, shows that he *must have [*446] had a knowledge of the exchange. Its apparent object was to ascertain the state of the title. The removal of the Wormley family, and their known residence, at this time, on the Fauquier lands, strengthen this presumption. If he knew of the exchange, he could not but know that he purchased of the trustee an estate, which he claimed as his own, in a bargain with an unauthorized person, and that the trustee was, at the same time, the vendor and purchaser. He also knew that the sale to himself was not in execution of the power, or for the purpose of re-investment; for, according to the other facts, the exchange had already effected that, and no further re-investment was contemplated. He took a mortgage, as additional security for the warranty, on the sale of the Fauquier lands, not even now alleging that he did not know their identity. And under these circumstances, he could not but know that there had been no actual conveyance or declaration of trust of the Fauquier lands, in execution of the trust, for otherwise the trustee could not have mortgaged them to him. He therefore stood by, taking a conveyance from the trustee of the trust estate, knowing at the same time that no re-investment had been made which could be effectual, and that no re-investment was contemplated as the object of the sale; and, as far as his mortgage could go, he meant to obtain a priority of security that should ride over any future declaration of trust.

This is not all. The very sale of the trust fund was to be, not for re-investment, but to 447* pay a large *debt due to himself, upon which a decree of foreclosure of a mortgaged estate had been obtained; and he could not be ignorant that the application of the trust fund to such a purpose was a violation of the settlement, and afforded a strong presumption that the trustee had no other adequate means of discharging the debt, or buying other lands advantageously in the market. And yet, with notice of all these facts, the deed itself, from the trustee to Veitch, contains a recital that the sale was made "with the intention of investing the proceeds of such sale in other lands of equal or greater value." This was utterly untrue, and could not escape the attention of the parties. Veitch then had full knowledge of all the material facts, and he does not even deny it in his answer, for that only denies the inference of fraud, which is a mere conclusion of law from the facts, as they are established. Purchasing, then, with a full knowledge of the rights of Mrs. Wormley and her children, and of the breach of trust, Veitch cannot now claim shelter in a court of equity, as a bonæ fidei purchaser for a valuable consideration.

The next question is, whether Castleman and M'Cormick are not in the same predicament. In the judgment of the court, they clearly are. They purchased from Veitch, whose deed gave them full notice of the trust, and they could not be ignorant of the recital in it, since their title referred them to it. They must have perceived that the sale to Veitch, in order to be valid, must have been with a view 448* to re-investment of the *purchase money in other real estate. It was natural for them to inquire whether the sale had been made under justifiable circumstances, and whether there had been any such re-investment. Previous to the sale to Veitch, they had entered into a negotiation with the trustee himself, for a direct purchase of the Frederick lands; and on that occasion became acquainted with the fact that the trustee was largely indebted to Veitch, and that one object of the sale was to apply the proceeds to the payment of that debt. How, then, could they be ignorant that the proceeds of the sale, which was very soon afterwards made to Veitch, were to be applied to extinguish the same debt, and that the transfer was not in execution of the trust, but to administer to the trustee's own necessities? This is not all. Before the execution of the deed to them they knew of the arrangement respecting the Fauquier lands, and that Wormley had become dissatisfied with the bargain. They knew that these lands had not been settled by the trustee upon the trusts of the settlement, and they took an equitable assignment of the mortgage from Veitch of the same lands. It may be said that the evidence of these facts is not positively made out in the record; but if it be not, the circumstantial evidence fully supports the conclusion. The answer itself of Castleman and M'Cormick does not deny notice of these facts. It states, indeed, that they supposed the transaction with Veitch fair, because they were satisfied that the trustee never received more from Veitch than what he has given the cestuis que trust credit for. *Was it a fair [449 execution of the trust, so to sell the estate, and to give credit for the proceeds? To apply them to pay the trustee's debts, and relieve his necessities? To sell without any definite intention as to a re-investment? They also deny all knowledge of fraud. But this is a mere general denial, and does not negative the knowledge of the facts, from which the law may infer fraud.

The subsequent conduct of Castleman and M'Cormick shows that they were not indifferent to the execution of the trust; but that they felt no interest to secure the rights of the cestuis que trust. They were privy to the removal to Kentucky, and exhibited much anxiety to have it accomplished. They knew subsequently the dissatisfaction of Wormley with that removal, and with the Kentucky lands. Yet they, in the year 1813, relieved the Fauquier lands from their own encumbrance, and enabled the trustee to dispose of it for other purposes than the fulfillment of the trusts for which it had been originally destined. And throughout the whole, their conduct exhibits an intimate acquaintance with the nature of their own title, and the manner and circumstances under which it had been acquired by Veitch, and the objections to which it might be liable. And they ultimately took the general warranty of Veitch, upon releasing their claim on the Fauquier lands, as a security for its validity.

There is a still stronger view which may be taken of this subject. It is a settled rule in equity, that a purchaser without notice, to be entitled to protection, must not only be so at the time of the *contract or conveyance, [450 but at the time of the payment of the purchase money. The answer of Castleman and M'Cormick does not even allege any such want of notice. On the contrary, it is in proof that upwards of $3,000 of the purchase money was paid in the autumn of 1813 and the spring of 1814. And this was not only after full notice of the anterior transactions, but after the commencement of the present suit.

It appears to us, therefore, that the circumstances of the case can lead to no other result than that Castleman and M'Cormick were not purchasers without notice of the material facts constituting the breach of trust; and that, therefore, the Frederick lands ought in their hands to stand charged with the trusts in the marriage settlement. The leading principle of the decree in the Circuit Court was therefore right.

Some objections have been taken to the subordinate details of that decree; but it appears to us that the objections cannot be sustained. The decree directs an account of the rents and profits of the Frederick lands while in possession of the defendants: It further directs an allowance of the amount of all encumbrances which have been discharged by the defendants, and of the value of any permanent improvements made thereon, and also of any advances made for the support of Wormley's family.

These advances are to be credited against the rents and profits; and the value of the improvements, and of the discharged encumbrances, not recouped by the rents and profits, are to be a charge on the land itself. A more liberal [451] *decree could not, in our opinion, be required by any reasonable view of the case.

An objection has been taken to the jurisdiction of the court, upon the ground that Wormley, the husband, is made a defendant, and so all the parties on each side of the cause are not citizens of different states, since he has the same citizenship as his wife and minor children. But Wormley is but a nominal defendant, joined for the sake of conformity in the bill, against whom no decree is sought. He voluntarily appeared, though perhaps he could not have been compelled so to do. Under these circumstances, the objection has no good foundation. This court will not suffer its jurisdiction to be ousted by the mere joinder or non-joinder of formal parties; but will rather proceed without them, and decide upon the merits of the case between the parties who have the real interests before it, whenever it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others.<sup>1</sup>

*Mr. Justice JOHNSON. After the [452] most careful examination of this voluminous record, I think it *due to the parties de- [453] fendant, to express the opinion that I cannot discover any evidence of fraud in any part of their transactions.

*The proposed exchange between the [454] Frederick and Fauquier lands was made openly and deliberately, *upon consultation [455] with friends of the cestuis que trust, and obviously had many prudential *considera- [456] tions to recommend it. That Wormley and his family must have starved had they remained

1.—The general rule and its exceptions, as to who are necessary parties to a bill in equity, are so fully and clearly laid down by Mr. Justice Story, in the case of West v. Randall (2 Mason's Rep., 181-190), and the principles of practice asserted in the judgment, are so closely connected with the above position in the principle case in the text, that the editor has thought fit to subjoin the following extract. It is only necessary to state that the case was of a bill filed by an heir or next of kin for a distributive share of an estate:

"It is a general rule in equity, that all persons materially interested, either as plaintiffs or defendants, in the subject-matter of the bill, ought to be made parties to the suit, however numerous they may be. The reason is, that the court may be enabled to make a complete decree between the parties, may prevent future litigation, by taking away the necessity of a multiplicity of suits, and may make it perfectly certain that no injustice shall be done, either to the parties before the court, or to others who are interested by a decree, that may be grounded upon a partial view only of the real merits. Mitf. Pl. 29, 144, 220; Coop. Eq. Pl. 33, &c., 185; 2 Madd. 142; Gilb. For. Rom. 157, 158; 1 Harris. Ch. Pr., ch. 3, p. 25; Newl. Edit; Leigh v. Thomas, 2 Ves. 312; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321; Beaumont v. Meredith, 3 Ves. and Beames, 180; Hamm v. Stevens, 1 Vern. 110. When all the parties are before the court, it can see the whole case; but it may not where all the conflicting interests are not brought out upon the bill. Gilbert, in his Forum Romanum, p. 157, states the rule, and illustrates it with great precision. 'If,' says he, 'it appears to the court that a very necessary party is wanting; that without him no regular decree can be made; as where a man seeks for an account of the profits or sale of a real estate, and it appears upon the pleadings that the defendant is only tenant for life, and consequently the tenant in tail cannot be bound by the decree; and where one legatee brings a bill against an executor, and there are many other legatees, none of which will be bound either by the decree or by the account to be taken of the testator's effects, and each of these legatees may draw the account in question over again at their leisure; or where several persons are entitled, as next of kin, under the statute of distributions, and only one of them is brought on to a hearing; or where a man is entitled to the surplus of an estate, under a will, after payment of debts, and is not brought on; or where the real estate is to be sold under a will, and the heir at law is not brought on. In these, and all other cases, where the decree cannot be made uniform, for as, on the one hand the court will do the plaintiff right, so, on the other hand they will take care that the defendant is not doubly vexed, he shall not be left under precarious circumstances because of the plaintiff, who might have made all proper parties, and whose fault it was that it was not done. The cases here put are very appropriate to the case at bar. That in respect to legatees, probably refers to the case of a suit by one residuary legatee, where there are other residuary legatees; in which case it has often been held, that all must be joined in the suit. Parsons v. Neville, 3 Bro. Ch. Cas. 365; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321; Sherritt v. Birch, 3 Bro. Ch. 229; Alward v. Wheat, 8.

Hawkins, Rep. T. Finch, 113; Brown v. Rickets, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 553. But where a legatee sues for a specific legacy, or for a sum certain on the face of the will, it is not in general necessary that other legatees should be made parties, for no decree could be had against them, if brought to a hearing (Haycock v. Haycock, 2 Ch. Cas. 124; Dunstall v. Rabbett, Finch, 243; Attorney-General v. Ryder, 2 Ch. Cas. 178; Atwood v. Hawkins, Rep. F. Finch, 118; Wainwright v. Waterman, 1 Ves., Jun., 311); and in general, no person against whom, if brought to a hearing, no decree could be had, ought to be made a party. De Golls v. Ward, 3 P. Wms. 310. Note. And when a party is entitled to an aliquot proportion only of a certain sum in the hands of trustees, if the proportion and the sum be clearly ascertained and fixed upon the face of the trust, it has been held that he may file a bill to have it transferred to him, without making the persons entitled to the other aliquot shares of the fund, parties. Smith v. Snow, 3 Madd. Rep. 10. The reason is the same as above stated, for there is nothing to controvert with the other cestuis que trust. I am aware that it had been stated by an elementary writer of considerable character, that one of the next of kin of an intestate may sue for his distributive share, and the master will be directed by the decree, to inquire and state to the court, who are all the next of kin, and they may come in under the decree. Coop. Eq. Pl. 33, 40. This proposition may be true, sub modo; but that it is not universally true is apparent from the authority already stated. See Bradburn v. Harper, Amb. Rep. 374; 2 Madd. 146; Gilb. For. Rom. 157.

"The rule, however, that all persons materially interested in the subject of the suit, however numerous, ought to be parties, is not without exceptions. As Lord Eldon has observed, it being a general rule, established for the convenient administration of justice, it must not be adhered to in cases to which, consistently with practical convenience, it is incapable of application. Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321; and see S. P. Wendell v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 349. Whenever, therefore, the party supposed to be materially interested is without the jurisdiction of the court; or if a personal representative be a necessary party, and the right of representation is in litigation in the proper ecclesiastical court; or the bill itself seeks a discovery of the necessary parties; and, in either case, the facts are charged in the bill, the court will not insist upon the objection; but if it can, will proceed to make a decree between the parties before the court, since it is obvious that the case cannot be made better. Mitf. 145, 146; Coop. Eq. Pl. 39, 40; 2 Madd. Ch. Pr. 149; 1 Harris, Ch. 3. Nor are these the only cases; for where the parties are very numerous, and the court perceives that it will be almost impossible to bring them all before the court; or where the question is of general interest, and a few may sue for the benefit of the whole; or where the parties form a part of a voluntary association for public or private purposes, and may be fairly supposed to represent the rights and interests of the whole; in these and analogous cases, if the bill purports to be not merely in behalf of the plaintiffs, but of all others interested, the plea of the want of the parties will be repelled, and

457*] upon the lands in Frederiek, is abundantly proved; and no worse consequences could 458*] have *happened to them from either of these exchanges. It is satisfactorily shown, 459*] also, that the exchange *for the Fauquier land was highly advantageous. Taking money, as the most correct comparison of value, it 460*] *appears that the Frederiek land, after being long hawked about for sale, and having $1,000 added to its value by Strode, in the extinction of the mother's life estate, sold for no more than $5,500, a sum satisfactorily proved to be its full value at the time; whereas, the Fauquier land, after Wormley's refusal to take it, was sold for $8,000. So that the two tracts then stood in comparison of value, as $4,500 to $8,000. And that Strode was fully sensible of the great difference in value, and satisfied to bear the loss, is positively proved by the fact that when Wormley resolved to move to Kentucky, *they established the value of the [*461 Fauquier lands between themselves at $7,000; and Strode actually gave an acknowledgement to Wormley for $6,500, the balance of the $7,000, after dividing with him the sum paid for his mother's life estate.

The case is one in which, it is true, the conduct of the defendants is greatly exposed to misrepresentation and misconstruction; but when reduced to order, and examined, the circumstances admit of the most perfect reconciliation with the purest intentions. It is true that Strode was in debt; that it was necessary to sell the Fauquier lands to satisfy his credit-the court will proceed to a decree. Yet, in these cases, so solicitous is the court to attain substantial justice, that it will permit the other parties to come in under the decree, and take the benefit of it, or to show it to be erroneous, and award a rehearing; or will entertain a bill or petition which shall bring the rights of such parties more distinctly before the court, if there be certainty or danger of injury or injustice. Coop. Eq. Pl. 39; 2 Madd. 144, 145; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321. Among this class of cases are suits brought by a part of a crew of a privateer against prize agents, for an account, and their proportion of prize-money. There, if the bill be in behalf of themselves only, it will not be sustained; but if it be in behalf of themselves and all the rest of the crew, it will be sustained upon the manifest inconvenience of any other course; for it has been truly said, that no case can call more strongly for indulgence than where a number of seamen have interests; for their situation at any period, how many were living at any given time, how many are dead, and who are entitled to representation, cannot be ascertained (Good v. Blewitt, 13 Ves. 397; Leigh v. Thomas, 2 Ves. 312; Contra, Moffa v. Farquherson, 2 Bro. Ch. Cas. 338; Acc. Brown v. Harris, 13 Ves. 552; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321); and it is not a case, where a great number of persons, who ought to be defendants, are not brought before the court, but are to be bound by a decree against a few. So, also, is the common case of creditors suing on behalf of the rest, and seeking an account of the estate of their deceased debtor, to obtain payment of their demands; and there the other creditors may come in and take the benefit of the decree. Leigh v. Thomas, 2 Ves. 312; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 321; Hendricks v. Franklin, 2 Johns. Ch. Rep. 283; Brown v. Ricketts, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 553; Coop. Eq. Pl. 39 136. But Sir John Strange said, there was no instance of a bill by three or four, to have an account of the estate, without saying they bring it in behalf of themselves and the rest of the creditors. Leigh v. Thomas, 2 Ves. 312; Coop. Eq. Pl. 39. And legatees seeking relief, and an account against executors, may sue in behalf of themselves and all other interested persons, when placed in the same predicament as creditors. Brown v. Ricketts, 3 Johns. Ch. Rep. 553. Another class of cases is, where a few members of a voluntary society, or an unincorporated body of proprietors, have been permitted to sue in behalf of the whole, seeking relief, and an account against their own agents and committees. Such was the ancient case of the proprietors of the Temple Mills Brass Works (Chancery v. May, Prec. Ch. 592), and such were the modern cases of the Opera House, the Royal Circus, Drury Lane Theatre, and the New River Company. Lloyd v. Loaring, 9 Ves., Jr., 773; Adair v. New River Company, 11 Ves. 429; Cousins v. Smith, 13 Ves. 542; Coop. Eq. Pl. 40; Cockburn v. Thompson, 16 Ves. 32. There is one other class of cases, which I will just mention, where a lord of a manor has been permitted to sue a few of his tenants, or a few of the tenants have been permitted to sue the lord, upon the question of a right of common; or a parson has sued, or been sued by some of his parishioners, in respect to the right of tithes. In these and analogous cases of general right, the court dispense with having all the parties, who claim the same right, before it, from the manifest inconvenience, if not impossibility of doing it, and is satisfied with bringing so many before it, as may be considered as fairly representing that right, and honestly contesting in behalf of the whole, and therefore binding, in a sense, that right. 2 Madd. 145; Coop. Eq. Pl. 41; Mitf. Pl. 145; Adair v. New River Company, 11 Ves. 429. But even in the case of a voluntary society, where the question was, whether a dissolution and division of the funds, voted by the members, was consistent with their articles, the court refused to decree until all the members were made parties. Beaumont v. Meredith, 3 Ves. and Beames, 180. The principle upon which all these classes of cases stand, is that the court must either wholly deny the plaintiffs an equitable relief, to which they are entitled, or grant it without making other persons parties; and the latter it deems the least evil, as it can consider other persons as quasi parties to the record, at least for the purpose of taking the benefit of the decree, and of entitling themselves to other equitable relief, if their rights are jeopardized. Of course, the principle always supposes that the decree can, as between the parties before the court, be fitly made, without substantial injury to third persons. If it be otherwise, the court will withhold its interposition.

"The same doctrine is applied, and with the same qualification, to cases where a material party is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, as if the party be a partner with the defendant, and resident in a foreign country, so that he cannot be reached by the process of the court. There, if the court sees that, without manifest injustice to the parties before it, or to others, it can proceed to a decree, it acts upon its own notion of equity, without adhering to the objection. Coop. Eq. Pl. 35; Mitf. Pl. 146; Cowslad v. Cely, Prec. Ch. 83; Darwent v. Walton, 2 Atk. 510; Whalley v. Whalley, 1 Ves. 484, 487; Milligan v. Milledge, 3 Cranch's Rep. 220. The ground of this rule is peculiarly applicable to the courts of the United States; and, therefore, if a party who might otherwise be considered as material, by being a made party to the bill, would, from the limited nature of its authority, oust the court of its jurisdiction, I should strain hard to give relief as between the parties before the court; as, for instance, where a partner, or a joint trustee, or a residuary legatee, or one of the next of kin, from not being a citizen of the state where the suit was brought, or from being a citizen of the state, if made a plaintiff would defeat the jurisdiction, and thus destroy the suit, I should struggle to administer equity between the parties properly before us, and not suffer a rule, founded on mere convenience and general fitness, to defeat the purposes of justice. Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch's Rep. 69, 98.

"I have taken up more time in considering the doctrine as to making parties, than this cause seemed to require, with a view to relieve us from some of the difficulties pressed at the argument, and to show the distinctions (not always very well defined) upon which the authorities seem to rest. Apply them to the present case. The plaintiff claims, as heir, an undivided portion of the surplus, charged to be in the defendants' hands and possession. No reason is shown on the face of the bill why the other heirs, having the same common interest, are not parties to it. The answer gives their names, and shows them within the jurisdiction of the court, and as defendants, they might have been ors; that the money arising from the Frederick land was applied to the payment of Strode's debts. But there was nothing iniquitous in all this. It is perfectly explained thus: The Fauquier land must be sold to pay Strode's debts; the situation of the Wormleys on the trust estate was so bad that no change could make it worse; the removal to the Fauquier lands was thought advisable by all their friends; where, then, was the fraud in letting them have the Fauquier lands at an under price, and paying his debts out of the actual proceeds of the trust estate? The money arising from the latter was, under this arrangement, the price of the former. It was, in fact, paying his debts with the price of his own property, not that of the trust estate.

joined in this suit without touching the jurisdiction of the court, for they are all resident in this state. As plaintiffs they could not be joined without ousting our jurisdiction, for then some of the plaintiffs would have been citizens of the same state as the defendants. Strawbridge v. Curtiss, 3 Cranch's Rep. 267. Now, in the first place, the other heirs might, if parties, controvert the very fact of heirship in the plaintiff, and that would touch the very marrow of his right to the demand now in question.

The fact, however, is not denied or put in issue by the answer, and, therefore, as to the present defendants, it forms no ground of controversy. But they insist that the presentsuit will not close their accounts; and that the other heirs may sue them again, and controvert the whole matter now in litigation, and thus vex them with double inconveniences and perils. This is certainly true; and it is as certain that they could not be made plaintiffs without ousting the present plaintiff of his remedy here. They might have been made defendants; but the question is, whether the plaintiff is compellable so to make them, unless they deny his heirship, or they collude with the defendants. If there be no controversy between him and them, he could have no decree against them at the hearing; and it would be strange if, when he has nothing to allege against them, he must still name them as defendants in his bill. I agree to the general doctrine that where a residuary legatee sues, he must make the other residuary legatees parties; and I think it analogous to the present case. But there the rule would not apply if the other residuary legatees were in a foreign country, or without the reach of the jurisdiction of the court. The case of the next of kin, put by Gilbert in the passage before cited, is identical with the present. Gilb. For. Rom. 157, 158. But there the same exception must be implied. And even in a case where a mistake in a legacy, of an aliquot part of the personal estate, was sought to be rectified, and the next of kin were admitted to be necessary parties (as to which, however, as the executor represents all parties in interest as to the personal estate, a doubt might be entertained, whether, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, they were necessary defendants) (Peacock v. Monk, 1 Ves. 127; Lawson v. Barker, 1 Bro. Ch. Cas. 303; 1 Eq. Abrid. 73; p. 13; Anon. 1 Ves. 261; Wainwright v. Waterman, 1 Ves., Jr., 311), the court dispensed with their being made parties, it appearing that they were numerous and living in distant places, and the matter in dispute being small and the plaintiff a pauper. Bradwin v. Harpur, Ambler, 374. The rule is not, then, so inflexible that it may not fairly leave much to the discretion of the court; and upon the facts of the present case, it being impossible to make the other heirs plaintiffs, consistently with the preservation of the jurisdiction of the court, or to make them defendants, from any facts which can be truly charged against them, I should hesitate a good while before I should enforce the rule; and if the cause turned solely upon this objection, I should not be prepared to sustain it. Clarke v. Russell, 7 Cranch, 69, 98. There is, indeed, a difficulty upon the face of the bill, that it shows no reason why the other heirs were not made parties, as plaintiffs; and if there had been a demurrer, it might have been fatal. But the answer seems to set that right, by disclosing the

It has been argued that the sale of the trust estate was not made with a view to re-investment; but the evidence positively proves the contrary. It goes to show that the re-investment was the leading object, and actually took place previous to the sale of the trust [*462] estate. And even if that construction of the power be conceded, which would require the sale and re-investment to be simultaneous acts, or that which would render the purchaser liable for the application of the purchase money, the facts of the case would satisfy either exigency. For the re-investment was actually made simultaneously with the sale; or, if it was not finally consummated, the cause is to be found altogether in the anxiety of the defendants to satisfy a capricious man, and the ignor-citizenship and residence of the other heirs; and in this respect, relying on the facts as a defense, it may well aid the defects of the bill.

"There is, however, a more serious objection to this bill for the want of parties, and that is, that the personal representative of William West is not brought before the court, and for this no reason is assigned in the bill. Now, it is to be considered that the bill charges the defendants with trust property, personal as well as real, and prays an account and payment of the plaintiff's distributive share of each. I do not say that the heir, or next of kin, cannot, in any case, proceed for a distributive share against a third person, having in his possession the personal assets of the ancestor, without making the personal representative a party; but such a case, if at all, must stand upon very special circumstances, which must be charged in the bill. The administrator of the deceased is, in the first place, entitled to his whole personal estate, in trust for the payment of debts and charges, and as to the residue, in trust for the next of kin. The latter are entitled to nothing until the debts are paid; and they cannot proceed against the immediate debtor of the deceased, in any case, any more than legatees or creditors, unless they suggest fraud and collusion with the personal representative, and then he must be made a party, or some other special reason be shown for the omission. Newland v. Champion, 1 Ves. 105; Utterson v. Mair, 4 Bro. Ch. Cas. 270; S. C. 2 Ves., Jr., 95; Alsagar v. Rowley, 6 Ves. 751; Bickley v. Dodington, 2 Eq. Abrid., 78, 253. It is, therefore, in general, a fatal objection in a bill for an account of personal assets, that the administrator is not a party; nor is this objection repelled if there be none at the time, unless there be some legal impediment to a grant of administration. Humphreys v. Humphreys, 3 P. Wms. 348; Griffith v. Bateman, Rep. T. Finch, 334. Now, upon the facts of this case, it is apparent that William West died insolvent; and if so, it would be decisive against the plaintiff's title to any portion of the personalty. And as to the real estate, as that is also liable, in this state, to the debts of the intestate, this fact would be equally decisive of his title to any share in the real trust property. This shows how material to the cause the personal representative of the intestate is, since he is, ex officio, the representative, in cases of this sort, of the creditors. But upon the general ground, without reference to these special facts, I think that the personal representative of William West, not being a party, is a well-founded objection to proceeding to a decree. I am aware that a want of parties is not necessarily fatal, even at the hearing, because the cause may be ordered to stand over to make further parties (Anon. 2 Atk. 14; Coop. Eq. Pl. 289; Jones v. Jones, 3 Atk. 111); but this is not done of course, and rarely, unless where the cause, as to the new parties, may stand upon the bill and the answer of such parties. For if the new parties may controvert the plaintiff's very right to the demand in question, and the whole cause must be gone over again upon a just examination of witnesses, it seems at least doubtful whether it may not be quite as equitable to dismiss the cause without prejudice, so that the plaintiff may begin de novo. Gilb. For. Rom. 159. If this cause necessarily turned upon this point alone, I should incline to adopt this course."

ance of Strode in supposing himself justified in yielding to Wormley's judgment or will.

Had Strode actually sold the Fauquier lands; paid off his encumbrances from the purchase money; then sold the Frederick land; and re-invested the fund in a repurchase of the Fauquier lands, there could not have been an exception taken to the sufficiency of the re-investment. And then the transaction would, in a moral point of view, have been necessarily regarded as favorably as I am disposed to regard it. Yet it is unquestionable, that thus stated, it presents a correct summary of the whole transaction, as made out in the evidence. It has, however, been put together so as to admit of distorted views; and such will ever be the case where men expose themselves to suspicion by mixing up their own interests with the interests of others placed under their protection. I can see nothing but liberality in the conduct of Strode towards Wormley, and little else than improvidence, caprice, and ingratitude in the conduct of the latter.

463*] *Nevertheless, there are canons of the court of equity which have their foundation, not in the actual commission of fraud, but in that hallowed orison, "lead us not into temptation."

One of these is, that a trustee shall not be permitted to mix up his own affairs with those of the cestui que trust. Those who have examined the workings of the human heart, well know that in such cases the party most likely to be imposed upon is the actor himself, if honest; and if otherwise, that the scope for imposition given to human ingenuity, will enable it generally to baffle the utmost subtlety of legal investigation. Hence the fairness or unfairness of the transaction, or the comparison of price and value, is not suffered to enter into the consideration of the court, on these occurrences; but the rule is positive and general, that the cestui que trust may be restored to his original rights against the trustee, at his option. And where infants, &c., are interested, they will be restored or not, with a view solely to the benefit of the cestuis que trust. It is unquestionable, from the evidence, that both Veitch, and Castleman and M'Cormick, must be affected by both legal and actual notice of the transactions of Strode. They are, therefore, liable to the same decree which ought to be made against the latter.

It is, however, some satisfaction to me to be able to vindicate their innocence, while I feel myself compelled to subject them to a serious loss. The rule which requires this adjudication, may, in many cases, be a hard one, but it is a fixed rule, and has the sanction of public policy.

THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL IN FOREIGN PARTS

v.

THE TOWN OF NEW HAVEN, AND WILLIAM WHEELER.

A corporation for religious and charitable purposes, which is endowed solely by private benefactions, is a private eleemosynary corporation; although it is created by a charter from the government.

The capacity of private individuals (British subjects), or of corporations, created by the crown, in this country, or in Great Britain, to hold lands or other property in this country, was not affected by the revolution.

The proper courts in this country will interfere to prevent an abuse of the trusts confided to British corporations holding lands here to charitable uses, and will aid in enforcing the due execution of the trusts; but neither those courts, nor the local legislature where the lands lie, can adjudge a forfeiture of the franchises of the foreign corporation, or of its property.

The property of British corporations, in this country, is protected by the 6th article of the treaty of peace of 1783 in the same manner as those of natural persons; and their title, thus protected, is confirmed by the 9th article of the treaty of 1794, so that it could not be forfeited by any intermediate legislative act, or other proceeding, for the defect of alienage.

The termination of a treaty, by war, does not divest rights of property already vested under it.

Nor do treaties, in general, become extinguished, ipso facto, by war between the two governments. Those stipulating for a permanent arrangement of territorial, and other national rights, are, at most, suspended during the war, and revive at the peace, unless they are waived by the parties, or new and repugnant stipulations are made.

The act of the legislature of Vermont, of the 30th of October, 1794, granting the lands in that state, belonging to "The Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts," to the respective towns in which the lands lie, is void, and conveys no title under it.

*THIS case came before the court [*465] upon a certificate of a division in opinion of the judges of the Circuit Court for the District of Vermont. It was an action of ejectment, brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, in that court. The material facts, upon which the question of law arose, were stated in a special verdict, and are as follows:

By a charter granted by William III., in the thirteenth year of his reign, a number of persons, subjects of England, and there residing, were incorporated by the name of "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," in order that a better provision might be made for the preaching of the gospel, and the maintenance of an orthodox clergy in the colonies of Great Britain. The usual corporate powers were bestowed upon this society, and, amongst others, it was authorized to purchase estates of inheritance to the value of £2,000 per annum, and estates for lives or years, and goods and chattels, of any value. This charter of incorporation was duly accepted by the persons therein named; and the corporation has ever since existed, and now exists, as an organized body politic and corporate, in England, all the members thereof being subjects of the King of Great Britain.

NOTE.—See note to Trustees v. Hart, 4 Wheat. 1. Wheat. 8.

On the 2d of November, 1761, a grant was made by the Governor of the province of New Hampshire, in the name of the King, by which a certain tract of land, in that province, was granted to the inhabitants of the said province, and of the King's other governments, and to 466*] their heirs and *assigns, whose names were entered on the grant. The tract so granted was to be incorporated into a town, by the name of New Haven, and to be divided into sixty-eight shares, one of which was granted to "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts." The tract of land thus granted was divided among the grantees by sundry votes and proceedings of a majority of them, which, by the law and usage of Vermont, render such partition legal. The premises demanded by the plaintiffs, in this ejectment, were set-off to them in the above partition, but they had no agency in the division, nor was it necessary, by the law and usage of Vermont, in order to render the same valid.

On the 30th of October, 1794, the legislature of Vermont passed an act, declaring that the rights to land in that state, granted under the authority of the British government, previous to the revolution, to "The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," were thereby granted severally to the respective towns in which such lands lay, and to their use forever. The act then proceeds to authorize the selectmen of each town to sue for and recover such lands, if necessary, and to lease them out, reserving an annual rent, to be appropriated to the support of schools. Under this law, the selectmen of the town of New Haven executed a perpetual lease of a part of the demanded premises to the defendant, William Wheeler, on the 10th of February, 1800, reserving an annual rent of $5.50; immediately after which, the said Wheeler entered 467*] upon the land so leased, and has ever since held the possession thereof. Similar donations were made, about the same time with the above grant, to the plaintiffs, of lands lying within the limits of Vermont, by the Governor of New Hampshire, in the name of the King; but the plaintiffs never entered upon such lands, nor upon the demanded premises, nor in any manner asserted a claim or title thereto, until the commencement of this suit.

The verdict found a number of acts of the state of Vermont respecting improvements or settlements, and also the limitation of actions; but as the discussions at the bar did not involve any questions connected with those acts, those parts of the special verdict need not be more particularly noticed.

Upon this special verdict, the judges of the court below were divided in opinion upon the question, whether judgment should be rendered for the plaintiffs or defendants, and the question was thereupon certified to this court.

The cause was argued at the last term by Mr. Hopkinson for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Webster for the defendants, and continued to the present term for advisement.

Mr. Hopkinson, for the plaintiffs, stated that the act of the legislature of Vermont, of the 30th of October, 1794, could have no effect upon the title of the corporation, unless the principle upon which it purports to have been enacted is sound and legal. Two reasons are assigned in the preamble *to the act: [468 (1) That, by the custom and usages of nations, no aliens can, or of right ought to hold real estate in a country to whose jurisdiction they cannot be made amenable. (2) That the plaintiffs being a corporation erected by, and existing within a foreign jurisdiction, to which they alone are amenable, by reason whereof, at the time of the late revolution of this state, and of the United States, from the jurisdiction of Great Britain, all lands in the state, granted to the plaintiffs, became vested in the state, and have since that time remained unappropriated, &c. If these positions were true, then the plaintiffs cannot recover, independently of this act, which has no other effect than to vest the land, or the title thus accrued, in the state, or their grantees, the town schools. If, on the other hand, the position was untrue, the right of the plaintiffs remains unimpaired, and they are entitled to recover possession of the lands in the present action.

Against these positions, he would contend, (1) That the general position that no alien can hold real property in this country, is contradicted, at least as to all titles vested in British subjects, prior to the 4th of July, 1776, by the uniform and settled decision of this and other courts; both upon the general principle that the division of an empire makes no change in private rights of property, and under the operation of the treaties between the United States and Great Britain. (2) That independently of these treaty provisions, the title of an alien is not divested from him, nor vested in the state, until office found.

*1. There is no general law or custom [469 of nations, preventing aliens from holding lands in the different states of the world. It depends upon the municipal law of each particular nation, and, in this country, upon that of the several states of the Union. There are various regulations on the subject, in the different states; and non constat, by the special verdict, but what aliens, in general, may hold lands in Vermont. Be this as it may, the treaties of 1783 and 1794 form a paramount law in that state, and in all the states. In the case of The Society, &c., v. Wheeler,<sup>1</sup> this same corporation was sought to be defeated in its right to recover its lands in New Hampshire, not merely as aliens, but as alien enemies. But the court held that a license from the government to sue might be presumed, there being no evidence to the contrary; and as to the general principle of the right of an alien to bring an action for real property, Mr. Justice Story said that there was "no pretense for holding that the mere alienage of the demandants would form a valid bar to the recovery in this case, supposing the two countries were at peace; for, however, it might be true, in general, that an alien cannot maintain a real action, it is very clear that either upon the ground of the ninth article of the treaty of 1794, or upon the more general ground that the division of an empire works no forfeiture of rights previously acquired, for anything that appears on the present record, *the present action might well be main- [470 tained."

The treaty of 1783 forbids all forfeitures on either side. That of 1794 provides that the citizens and subjects of both nations, holding lands (thereby strongly implying that there were no forfeitures by the revolution), shall continue to hold, according to the tenure of their estates; that they may sell and devise them; and shall not, so far as respects these lands and the legal remedies to obtain them, be considered as aliens. In the case of Kelly v. Harrison,<sup>1</sup> which was that of an alien widow of a citizen of the United States, the Supreme Court of New York held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover dower of lands of which her husband was seized, prior to the 4th of July, 1776, but not of lands subsequently acquired. The British treaties were not considered by the court as bearing on the case. It was, therefore, the naked question, of the effect of the revolution, even upon a contingent right to real property, acquired antecedent to the revolution. In the same case, Mr. Chief Justice Kent says: "I admit the doctrine to be sound (Calvin's case, 7 Co. 27 b.; Kirby's Rep., 413), that the division of an empire works no forfeiture of a right previously acquired. The revolution left the demandant where she was before."<sup>2</sup> The case of Jackson v. Lunn<sup>3</sup> gives the same principle, and *also recognizes the treaty of 1794, as confirming the title of persons holding lands.

In Harden v. Fisher,<sup>4</sup> which was also under the treaty of 1794, this court held that it was not necessary for the party to show a seisin in fact, or actual possession of the land, but only that the title was in him, or his ancestors, at the time the treaty was made. The treaty applies to his title, as existing at that epoch, and gives it the same legal validity as if he were a citizen. In a subsequent case, Jackson v. Clark,<sup>5</sup> where the point was whether an alien enemy could make a will of lands in New York, or convey his estate in any manner, the court would not hear an argument, it being settled by former decisions.<sup>6</sup> In Orr v. Hodgson,<sup>7</sup> the court confirmed the same doctrine, and also determined that the 6th article of the treaty of 1783 was not meant to be confined to confiscations jure belli; but completely protected the titles of British subjects from forfeiture by escheat for the defect of alienage. But the great leading case on this subject, is that of Fairfax v. Hunter,<sup>8</sup> where the operation of the treaty of 1794 was determined as confirming the titles of British subjects, even where there had been a previous cause of forfeiture, but no office found, or other proceeding to assert the right of the state. And in Terrett v. Taylor,<sup>9</sup> which was *472* the case of an ecclesiastical corporation, it was held that the dissolution of the regal government no more destroyed the right to possess and enjoy the property than it did of any other corporation or individual, the division of an empire creating no forfeiture of vested rights of property.

2. At all events, the alien lost no right, and the state acquired none, until office found.

It is firmly settled by the uniform decisions of this court, and of the most respectable state courts, that an alien may take an interest in lands, and hold the same against all the world, except the government, and even against it, until office found.<sup>10</sup>

If, then, the plaintiffs are to be considered as aliens, and labor under no other disability, it is clear that their title to the lands in question remains unimpaired, and as it existed previous to the 4th of July, 1776; and this upon three grounds: (1) Of the general law on the division of an empire. (2) Of the operation of the treaties of 1783 and 1794. (3) On the ground that the title of the state acquired by forfeiture, if any, had not been asserted by, nor that of the plaintiffs divested by, an inquest of office. And consequently, that the first position assumed by the legislature of Vermont to justify its act, is unfounded in law.

The second ground taken by the legislature is, *that the plaintiffs having become a [*473 foreign corporation by the revolution, could not continue to hold lands in this country after that event.

This presents the single question whether an alien corporation is in a different situation, in this respect, from an alien individual. On the part of the plaintiffs we contend that all the legal principles and rules which go to protect the title of an individual, will equally avail to protect that of a corporation; and that whether the security of the former is founded upon the general law as to the division of an empire, or upon the peculiar stipulations of the treaties of 1783 and 1794, or the defect of an inquest of office.

In this case, although the trust is in aliens, the use is to citizens of our own country; and the forfeiture would, therefore, only affect those in whom the beneficial interest is vested. On what ground can it be insisted, that a British corporation, holding lands in this country, in trust for British subjects prior to the declaration of independence, forfeited the lands at that epoch, and that they became ipso facto vested in the state where they lie, without office found, or other equivalent legal ceremony? If there be no such principle of law, and if, where the whole interest is British, it is protected, why should it not be equally protected where the real beneficial interest is American, and the trusteeship only is British? It is obvious that the revolution has nothing to do with the question. The position assumed by the legislature of Vermont must stand or fall, independent of that circumstance, and its introduction only *tends to confuse the inquiry. The [*474 broad position is, that at no time, nor under any circumstances, can a foreign corporation, or trustee, hold lands in this country for any use whatever. And why is it thought indispensably necessary, that the corporation, which in this case is the trustee, should be locally within our jurisdiction? The answer will be, undoubtedly, in order to prevent neglect, or abuse of the trust. But that is properly a matter between the trustee and the cestuis que trust; and it is a strange remedy to take the property from both, least the former should impose upon the latter. If abuses should be found to exist, an appropriate legal remedy may easily be found. In England, alienage is no plea in abatement in the case of a corporation. By the old law, an abbot or prior alien could have an action real, personal or mixed, for any thing concerning the possessions or goods of the monastery, because they sue in their corporate capacity, and not in their own right to carry the effects out of the kingdom.<sup>1</sup> The circumstance, that the execution of the trust is in England, is here regarded. A corporation can have no local habitation. The disability must result from the character of the individual members. Thus, it is held, that a body corporate, as such, cannot be a citizen of any particular state of the Union; and its right to sue, or not to sue, in the federal courts, depends solely upon the character of the individual members.<sup>2</sup>

475*] *Whatever danger there may be from a foreign corporation holding lands in this country, it can only be a reason for restraint and regulation, but not for confiscation and forfeiture. If the execution of the trust can be regulated otherwise than according to the charter, it must be from the necessity of the case only; and the legislative interference must not go beyond providing an adequate remedy by some appropriate judicial proceeding. To say that the corporation, so far as respects these lands, is dissolved by the revolution, is to say that the lands are forfeited by the revolution. The trust remains, the corporate body remains, the land remains; but all connection between them (that is, the right of the corporation to hold in trust for the same purposes) is dissolved by the separation of the empire. It is only necessary to state this proposition to show its inconsistency with the well-established principles of law.

Mr. Webster, contra, contended, 1. That the capacity of the plaintiffs, as a corporation, to hold lands in Vermont, ceased by, and as a consequence of, the revolution.

2. That the Society for Propagating the Gospel, being in its politic capacity a foreign corporation, is incapable of holding lands in Vermont, on the ground of alienage; and that its rights are not protected by the treaties of 1783 and 1794.

3. That if those rights were so protected, the effect of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, was such as to put an end to those treaties, and, consequently, to rights derived *under them, unless they had [*476 been revived by the treaty of peace at Ghent, which was not done.

He argued on the first and second points, that the dismemberment of the British empire dissolved this corporation, so far as respects its capacity to hold lands in this country, not merely because they are aliens, but from the peculiar circumstances of the case. The society is such a corporation as cannot hold lands in England, under the statutes of mortmain, without a license from the crown, which they have in their charter. But this license does not extend to authorize them to hold lands in the colonies. The statutes of mortmain do not extend to the colonies.<sup>3</sup> In the interpretation of treaties, the probable intention of the framers is to be taken as the guide, and the sense of the terms they use is to be limited and restrained by the circumstances of the case.<sup>4</sup> The British treaties are to be construed, not only as *the [*477 sort of title meant to be protected, but also the sort of persons and property meant to be protected. The mere personal disability of British subjects to hold lands, is taken away. They are protected against escheat. But corporations, such as this, ought to be considered as impliedly excepted from this provision. This might well be contended, even as to those who have a beneficial proprietary interest, and a fortiori, as to such as are mere trustees. In the present case, the revolution has violently separated the trustees from the property, and from the cestuis que trust. The former are in a foreign country, the latter are here. Can it be imagined that the treaties meant to take from the courts of equity of this country the ordinary power of enforcing the trust, or of changing the trustee in case of abuse or inability to perform his trust, independent of the statute of Elizabeth? But if the legislature cannot change the trustee, neither can the courts. Reciprocity lies at the foundation of all treaties between nations. But the English Court of Chancery has determined that it cannot enforce a trust connected with a charity in this country. Thus, Lord Thurlow took the administration of a charity, under an appointment by the trustees, and a plan confirmed by a decree of the court, out of the hands of William and Mary College, in Virginia, because the trustees had become foreign subjects by the separation of the two countries; and even denied costs to the college, because its existence as a corporation had not been, and could not be *proved since [*478 the revolution.<sup>5</sup> So, also, where the state of Maryland claimed certain bank stock which had been vested in the hands of trustees in England, by the colony of Maryland, before the

Elle sert particulièrement à fixer le sens de certaines expressions, dont la signification n'est pas suffisamment déterminée. En vertu de cette règle, il faut prendre ces expressions dans le sens le plus étendu, quand il est vraisemblable que celui qui parle a eu en vue tout ce qu'elles désignent dans ce sens étendu: et au contraire, on doit en resserrer la signification, s'il paraît que l'auteur a borné sa pensée à ce qui est compris dans le sens le plus resserré."

revolution, the claim was rejected by Lord Rosslyn, upon the ground that the colonial government, which existed under the King's charter, was dissolved by the revolution, and though Great Britain had acknowledged the state of Maryland, yet the property which belonged to a corporation, which had thus become a foreign corporation, or been dissolved, could not be transferred to a body which did not exist under the authority of the British government. The new state could take only such rights of the old as were within their jurisdiction, and the fund, no object of the trust existing, must be considered as bona vacantia at the disposal of the crown.<sup>1</sup>

In the case now before this court, either the corporation is dissolved, or it has become a foreign corporation. If it still exists, for any purpose, it may forfeit its franchises for non-user or misuser. If its franchises are forfeited, a forfeiture of its property follows as a matter of course. But how is a quo warranto, or any other process, to go against it from our courts? And if the proceeding is in the English courts, to whom is the property to revert? It is plain that 479* it can revert to *no other than the grantor, i. e., the state of Vermont representing the crown

Here, the state, instead of proceeding in a court of equity to enforce a trust, or to present a new scheme for the administration of the charity, has proceeded to escheat the property for defect of alienage in those who claim the legal title. This it has done directly by a legislative act, and not through an inquest of office, or any analogous ceremony, which was unnecessary.<sup>2</sup>

Upon the third point, he argued, that even supposing the treaties of 1783 and 1794 protected the rights of property of the plaintiffs, whether beneficial or fiduciary, yet the late war abrogated such provisions of those treaties as were not revived by the peace of Ghent. The general rule certainly is, that whatever subsists by treaty, is lost by war.<sup>3</sup> Peace merely restores the two nations to their natural state.<sup>4</sup>

480* *Foreigners cannot, independent of conventional stipulations, by the general usage of nations, or by the common law, hold lands in this country. This pre-existing law, therefore, revives, there being no recognition in the treaty of Ghent of the articles of the former treaties, excepting British subjects from the operation of the rule.

Mr. Justice WASHINGTON delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

It has been contended by the counsel for the defendants,

1st. That the capacity of the plaintiffs, as a corporation, to hold lands in Vermont, ceased by, and as a consequence of, the revolution.

2d. That the society being, in its politic capacity, a foreign corporation, it is incapable of holding land in Vermont, on the ground of alienage; and that its rights are not protected by the treaty of peace.

3d. That if they were so protected, still the effect of the last war between the United States and Great Britain was to put an end to that treaty, and consequently, to rights derived under it, unless they had been revived by the treaty of peace, which was not done.

1. Before entering upon an examination of the first objection, it may be proper to premise that this society is to be considered as a private eleemosynary *corporation, although it [481 was created by a charter from the crown, for the administration of a public charity. The endowment of the corporation was to be derived solely from the benefactions of those who might think proper to bestow them, and to this end the society was made capable to purchase and receive real estates, in fee, to a certain annual value, and also estates for life, and for years, and all manner of goods and chattels to any amount.

When the defendants' counsel contends that the incapacity of this corporation to hold lands in Vermont is a consequence of the revolution, he is not understood to mean that the destruction of civil rights, existing at the close of the revolution, was, generally speaking, a consequence of the dismemberment of the empire. If that could ever have been made a serious question, it has long since been settled in this and other courts of the United States. In the case of Dawson's lessee v. Godfrey (4 Cranch, 323), it was laid down by the judge who delivered the opinion of the court, that the effect of the revolution was not to deprive an individual of his civil rights; and in the case of Terrett v. Taylor (9 Cranch, 43), and of Dartmouth College v. Woodward (4 Wheat. Rep., 518), the court applied the same principle to private corporations existing within the United States at the period of the revolution. It is very obvious, from the course of reasoning adopted in the two last cases, that the court was not impressed by any circumstance peculiar to such corporations, which distinguished them, in *this re- [482 spect, from natural persons; on the contrary, they were placed upon precisely the same ground. In Terrett v. Taylor, it was stated that the dissolution of the regal government, no more destroyed the rights of the church to possess and enjoy the property which belonged to it, than it did the right of any other corporation or individual to his or its own property. In the latter case, the Chief Justice, in reference to the corporation of the college, observes that en cas de rupture; par exemple le temps qui sera donné aux sujets, de part et d'autres, pour se retirer; la neutralité assurée d'un commun consentement à une ville, à une province, &c. Puisque, par des traités de cette nature, on veut pourvoir à ce qui devra s'observer en cas de rupture, on renonce au droit de les annuler par la déclaration de guerre."

3.—Marten's Law of Nations, l. 2, c. 1, s. 8; Vattel, l. 3, c. 10, s. 175. "Les conventions, les traités faits avec une nation, sont rompus ou annulés par la guerre qui s'élève entre les contractants; soit parcequ'ils supposent tacitement l'état de paix, soit parceque chacun pouvant dépouiller son ennemi de ce qu'il lui appartient, lui ôte les droits qu'il lui avait donnés par des traités. Cependant il faut excepter les traités où on stipule certaines choses

it is too clear to require the support of argument, that all contracts and rights respecting property remained unchanged by the revolution; and the same sentiment was enforced, more at length, by the other judge who noticed this point in the cause.

The counsel, then intended, no doubt, to confine this objection to a corporation consisting of British subjects, and existing in its corporate capacity in England, which is the very case under consideration. But if it be true that there is no difference between a corporation and a natural person, in respect to their capacity to hold real property; if the civil rights of both are the same, and are equally unaffected by the dismemberment of the empire, it is difficult to perceive upon what ground the civil rights of a British corporation should be lost, as a consequence of the revolution, when it is admitted that those of an individual would remain unaffected by the same circumstance.

But it is contended by the counsel, that the principle so firmly established, in relation to 483* corporations *existing in the United States at the period of the revolution, is inapplicable to this corporation, inasmuch as the courts of Vermont can exercise no jurisdiction over it, to take away its franchise, in case of a forfeiture of them, by misuser or non-user, or in any manner to change the trustees, however necessary such interference might be, for the due administration and management of the charity. If this be a sound reason for the alleged distinction, it would equally apply to other trusts, where the trustees happened to be British subjects, residing in England, and entitled to lands in Vermont, not as a corporate body, but as natural persons claiming under a common grant. The question of amenability to the tribunals of Vermont would be the same in both cases, as would be the consequent incapacity of both to hold the property to which they had an unquestionable legal title at the period of the revolution.

It is very true, as the counsel has insisted, that the courts of Vermont might not have jurisdiction in the specified cases; and it is quite clear that were they to exercise it, and decree a forfeiture of the franchises of the corporation or the removal of the trustees, the plaintiffs would not be less a corporation, clothed with all its corporate rights and franchises.

But it is not perceived by the court how this exemption of the corporation from the jurisdiction of a foreign court to forfeit its franchises, or to interfere in its management of the charity, can destroy, or in any manner affect its civil rights, or its capacity to hold and enjoy the 484* property legally *vested in it. It would surely be an extraordinary principle of law, which should visit such a corporation with the same consequences, on account of a want of jurisdiction in the courts of the country where the property lies to inquire into its conduct, as would happen if, after such an inquiry, judicially made, the corporation should be found to have forfeited its franchises; in other words, that the possibility that the corporation might commit a forfeiture, which the law will not presume, or might require the interference of a court of chancery to enforce the due administration of the charter, which might never happen, should produce a forfeiture, or something Wheat. 8.

equivalent to it, of the very funds which were, in whole, or in part, to feed and sustain the charity. This, nevertheless, seems to be the amount of the argument, and it is deemed by the court too unreasonable to be maintained, unless it appeared to be warranted by judicial decisions. It would seem that the state in which the property lies ought to be satisfied that the courts of the country in which the corporation exists, will not permit it to abuse the trusts confided to it, or to want their assistance, when it may be required to enable it to perform them in a proper way.

Were it even to be admitted that the legislature of Vermont was competent to pronounce a sentence of forfeiture of the property belonging to this corporation, upon the ground of its having abused, or not used its franchises, still the act of 1794 does not profess to have proceeded upon that ground. The only reasons assigned in the *preamble of the act, [*485 for depriving the plaintiffs of this property, are, 1. That, by the custom and usages of nations, aliens cannot, and ought not to hold real estate in a country to whose jurisdiction they cannot be made amenable; and, 2. That this corporation, being created by, and existing within a foreign jurisdiction, all lands in the state, granted to the said society, became vested, by the revolution, in that state. For aught that appears to the contrary, the society was, at the moment when the act passed, fulfilling the trusts confided to it in the best manner for promoting the benevolent and laudable objects of its incorporation. It may further be remarked that the effect of this act is not merely to deprive the corporation of its legal control over the charity, so far as respects the property in question, but to destroy the trusts altogether, by transferring the property to other persons, and for other uses, than those to which they were originally destined by the grant made to the society.

The case chiefly relied upon by the defendants' counsel, in support of his first point, was that of the Attorney-General v. The City of London (1 Ves., Jr., 247, and 3 Bro. Ch. Cas., 171), under the will of Mr. Boyle, which directed the residue of his estate to be laid out by his executors for charitable, and other pious uses, at their discretion. They purchased, under a decree of the Court of Chancery, the manor of Brafferton, which they conveyed to the city of London, upon trust to lay out the rents and profits in the advancement of the Christian religion among infidels, as the Bishop *of [*486 London, and one of the executors, should appoint, such appointment to be confirmed by a decree of the Court of Chancery. The trustees appointed a certain part of the rents and profits to be paid to an agent in London, for the college of William and Mary in Virginia, for the purpose of maintaining and educating in the Christian religion, as many Indian children as the fund would support; the president, &c., of the college to transmit accounts of their receipts and expenditures yearly to the Court of Chancery, and to be subject to certain rules then prescribed, and to such others as should thereafter be adopted with the approbation of the court. This appointment was ratified by a decree of the Court of Chancery. The object of the information was to have the disposition of this charity taken from the college, and that the master should lay before the court a new scheme for the future disposition of the charity. The new scheme was ordered by the chancellor, upon the ground that the college, belonging to an independent government, was no longer under the control of the court.

The difference between that case and the present is, that in that, the president, &c., of the college, were not the trustees appointed by the will of Mr. Boyle, or by his executors, to manage the charity, but were the mere agents of the trustees for that purpose, or rather the servants of the Court of Chancery, as they are styled by the counsel for the college, in the administration of the charity, subject to such orders and rules as might be prescribed by the 487* trustees, and sanctioned by the *chancellor. The college had a mere authority to dispose of the charity, but without any interest whatever in the fund. The trustees resided in England, and there, too, was the fund. The president, &c., of the college derived all their authority from the trustees, and from the Court of Chancery. To that court they were accountable, and were necessarily removable by the court, whenever it should appear to the chancellor to be necessary for the due administration of the charity.

In the present case, the plaintiffs were, at the period of the revolution, entitled to the legal estate in the land in question, under a valid and subsisting grant; and the only question is, whether the estate so vested in them, was divested by the revolution, and became the property of the state. We have endeavored to show that it was not.

The case of Barclay v. Russel (3 Ves., 424) was also mentioned by the defendants' counsel, and ought, therefore, to be noticed by the court. That was a claim on the part of the state of Maryland, of certain funds which had been vested in trustees in London, before the American revolution, by the old government of Maryland, in trust for certain specific purposes. The case is long, and rather obscurely reported; but in the case of Dolben v. The Bank of England (10 Ves., 352), the lord chancellor states the ground upon which the claim was rejected. His lordship observes that "that was a case in which the old government existed under the King's charter, and a revolution took 488* place, though the new government *was acknowledged by this country. Yet it was held, that the property, which belonged to a corporation existing under the King's charter, was not transferred to a body which did not exist under his authority, and, therefore, the fund in this country was considered to be bona vacantia belonging to the crown.

Another, and perhaps a more intelligible reason, is assigned in the case itself, namely, that the funds were vested by the old government in the hands of the trustees, by the act of 1733, for certain specific trusts, the execution of which was then rendered impossible. "There is no specific purpose," says the chancellor, "that the will of the present government can point out, for which purpose, according to the original creation of the trust, I can direct the trustee to transfer. It is, therefore, the common case of a trust, without any specific purpose to which it can be applied; the consequence of which is that the right to dispose of this money is vested in the crown."

Now, it is quite clear, that if the premises upon which this case was decided were correct, the conclusion is so. The old government was treated as a corporation, which ceased to exist as such by the new form of government, deriving its name, its existence and its constitution, from a totally different source from that under which the old corporation existed. The old corporation no longer existed, the consequence of which was precisely that which would take place in case of the dissolution of any private corporation; their *legal rights would [*489 cease, and would not descend or pass to the new corporation. So, too, if the specific purpose for which the trust was created had ceased, the disposition of the fund clearly devolved upon the crown.

But, in this case, the plaintiffs exist, at this day, as a corporation, precisely as it did before the revolution; and the specific purposes to which the trust was to be applied, by the terms of the charter, still remain the same. The cases, therefore, are totally unlike each other.

2. The next question is, was this property protected against forfeiture, for the cause of alienage, or otherwise, by the treaty of peace? This question, as to real estates belonging to British subjects, was finally settled in this court, in the case of Orr v. Hodgson (4 Wheat. Rep., 453), in which it was decided that the 6th article of the treaty protected the titles of such persons, to lands in the United States, which would have been liable to forfeiture, by escheat, for the cause of alienage, or to confiscation, jure belli.

The counsel for the defendants did not controvert this doctrine, so far as it applies to natural persons; but he contends that the treaty does not, in its terms, embrace corporations existing in England, and that it ought not to be so construed. The words of the 6th article are, "there shall be no future confiscations made, nor any prosecutions commenced, against any person or persons, for or by reason of the part which he or they may have taken in the present war; and that no person shall, on that account, suffer any future *loss or damage, either [*490 in his person, liberty, or property," &c.

The terms in which this article is expressed are general and unqualified, and we are aware of no rule of interpretation applicable to treaties, or to private contracts, which would authorize the court to make exceptions by construction, where the parties to the contract have not thought proper to make them. Where the language of the parties is clear of all ambiguity, there is no room for construction. Now, the parties to this treaty have agreed that there shall be no future confiscations in any case, for the cause stated. How can this court say that this is a case where, for the cause stated, or for some other, confiscation may lawfully be decreed? We can discover no sound reason why a corporation existing in England may not as well hold real property in the United States, as ordinary trustees for charitable, or other purposes, or as natural persons for their own use. We have seen, that the exemption of either, or all of those persons, from the jurisdiction of the courts of the state where the property lies, affords no such reason.

It is said that a corporation cannot hold lands, except by permission of the sovereign authority. But this corporation did hold the land in question, by permission of the sovereign authority, before, during and subsequent to the revolution, up to the year 1794, when the legislature of Vermont granted it to the town of New Haven; and the only question is, whether 491* [this grant was not void *by force of the 6th article of the above treaty. We think it was.

Was it meant to be contended that the plaintiffs are not within the protection of this article, because they are not persons who could take part in the war, or who can be considered by the court as British subjects? If this were to be admitted, it would seem to follow that a corporation cannot lose its title to real estate, upon the ground of alienage, since, in its civil capacity, it cannot be said to be born under the allegiance of any sovereign. But this would be to take a very incorrect view of the subject. In the case of The Bank of The United States v. Deveaux (5 Cranch's Rep., 86), it was stated by the court that a corporation, considered as a mere legal entity, is not a citizen, and therefore could not, as such, sue in the courts of the United States, unless the rights of the members of it, in this respect, could be exercised in their corporate name. It was added that the name of the corporation could not be an alien or a citizen; but the corporation may be the one or the other, and the controversy is, in fact, between those persons and the opposing party.

But even if it were admitted that the plaintiffs are not within the protection of the treaty, it would not follow that their right to hold the land in question was divested by the act of 1794, and became vested in the town of New Haven. At the time when this law was enacted, the plaintiffs, though aliens, had a complete, though defeasible, title to the land, of 492* [which they could not be deprived *for the cause of alienage, but by an inquest of office; and no grant of the state could, upon the principles of the common law, be valid, until the title of the state was so established. (Fairfax's devisee v. Hunter's lessee, 7 Cranch's Rep., 503). Nor is it pretended by the counsel for the defendants that this doctrine of the common law was changed by any statute law of the state of Vermont, at the time when this land was granted to the town of New Haven. This case is altogether unlike that of Smith v. The State of Maryland (6 Cranch's Rep., 286), which turned upon an act of that state, passed in the year 1780, during the revolutionary war, which declared that all property within the state, belonging to British subjects, should be seized, and was thereby confiscated to the use of the state; and that the commissioners of confiscated estates should be taken as being in the actual seisin and possession of the estates so confiscated, without any office found, entry, or other act to be done. The law in question passed long after the treaty of 1783, and without confiscating or forfeiting this land (even if that could be legally done), grants the same to the town of New Haven.

3. The last question respects the effect of the late war between Great Britain and the United States, upon rights existing under the treaty of peace. Under this head, it is contended by the defendants' counsel, that although the plaintiffs were protected by the treaty of peace, still the effect of the last war was to put an end to that treaty, and, consequently, to civil rights derived *under it, unless they had been revived [493 and preserved by the treaty of Ghent.

If this argument were to be admitted in all its parts, it nevertheless would not follow that the plaintiffs are not entitled to a judgment on this special verdict. The defendants claim title to the land in controversy solely under the act of 1794, stated in the verdict, and contend that by force of that law, the title of the plaintiffs was divested. But if the court has been correct in its opinion upon the two first points, it will follow that the above act was utterly void, being passed in contravention of the treaty of peace, which, in this respect, is to be considered as the supreme law. Remove that law, then, out of the case, and the title of the plaintiffs, confirmed by the treaty of 1794, remains unaffected by the last war, it not appearing from the verdict that the land was confiscated, or the plaintiffs' title in any way divested, during the war, or since, by office found, or even by any legislative act.

But there is a still more decisive answer to this objection, which is, that the termination of a treaty cannot divest rights of property already vested under it.

If real estate be purchased or secured under a treaty, it would be most mischievous to admit that the extinguishment of the treaty extinguished the right to such estate. In truth, it no more affects such rights than the repeal of a municipal law affects rights acquired under it. If, for example, a statute of descents, be repealed, it has never been supposed that rights of property *already vested during its [494 existence, were gone by such repeal. Such a construction would overturn the best established doctrines of law, and sap the very foundation on which property rests.

But we are not inclined to admit the doctrine urged at the bar, that treaties become extinguished, ipso facto, by war between the two governments, unless they should be revived by an express or implied renewal on the return of peace. Whatever may be the latitude of doctrine laid down by elementary writers on the law of nations, dealing in general terms in relation to this subject, we are satisfied that the doctrine contended for is not universally true. There may be treaties of such a nature, as to their object and import, as that war will put an end to them; but where treaties contemplate a permanent arrangement of territorial, and other national rights, or which, in their terms, are meant to provide for the event of an intervening war, it would be against every principle of just interpretation to hold them extinguished by the event of war. If such were the law, even the treaty of 1783, so far as it fixed our limits, and acknowledged our independence, would be gone, and we should have had again to struggle for both upon original revolutionary principles. Such a construction was never asserted, and would be so monstrous as to supersede all reasoning.

We think, therefore, that treaties stipulating for permanent rights, and general arrangements, and professing to aim at perpetuity, and to deal with the case of war as well as of peace, do no.

ease on the occurrence of war, but are, at most, 495* only suspended *while it lasts; and unless they are waived by the parties, or new and repugnant stipulations are made, they revive in their operation at the return of peace.

A majority of the court is of opinion that judgment upon this special verdict ought to be given for the plaintiffs, which opinion is to be certified to the Circuit Court.

[DEVISE.]

DALY'S LESSEE v. JAMES.

J. B. devises all his real estate to the testator's son, J. B., Jun., and his heirs lawfully begotten; and, in case of his death without such issue, he orders A. Y., his executors and administrators, to sell the real estate within two years after the son's death; and he bequeaths the proceeds thereof to his brothers and sisters, by name, and their heirs forever, or such of them as shall be living at the death of the son, to be divided between them in equal proportions, share and share alike. All the brothers and sisters die, leaving issue. Then A. Y. dies, and afterwards J. B., Jun., the son, dies without issue. Heirs is a word of limitation; and none of the testator's brothers and sisters being alive at the death of J. B., Jun., the devise to them failed to take effect.

Quære, Whether a sale by the executors, &c., under such circumstances, is to be considered as valid in a court of law.

However this may be, a sale, thus made, after the lapse of two years from the death of J. B., Jun., is without authority, and conveys no title.

Quære, Under what circumstances a court of equity might relieve, *in case the trustee should refuse to exercise the power within the prescribed period, or should exercise the same after that period.

A power to A. Y., and his executors or administrators, to sell, may be executed by the executors of the executors of A. Y.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania.

This was an action of ejectment, brought in the court below, by the plaintiffs in error, to recover the possession of a messuage and lot in the city of Philadelphia. The special verdict in the case stated that on the 8th of August, 1768, John Bleakley, of Philadelphia, being then in London, made and duly executed his last will, as follows: "In the name of God, Amen. I, John Bleakley, of Philadelphia, Esquire, now in London, and shortly bound to Philadelphia, being in perfect health, and of sound and disposing mind, memory, and understanding, and considering the certainty of death, and the uncertainty of the time thereof, do therefore make and declare this my last will and testament, in manner following, that is to say: First, and principally, I commend my soul to God, and my body to the earth or sea, as he shall please to order; and as for and concerning my worldly estate, I give, devise and bequeath the same in manner following, that is to say: First, I will and desire that all my just debts and funeral expenses (if any) be fully paid and satisfied, as soon as conveniently may be after my decease. Also, I give and bequeath to my brother, David Bleakley, living in the north of Ireland, the sum of ten pounds sterling. Also, I give and bequeath to my brother, William Bleakley, living near Dungannon, the sum of ten pounds sterling. Also, I *give and *497 bequeath to my sister, Margaret Harkness, of Dungannon, the sum of one hundred pounds sterling. Also, I give and bequeath to my sister, Sarah Boyle, wife of the Rev. Mr. Boyle, the sum of ten pounds sterling. Also, I give and bequeath to my cousin, Archibald Young, of Philadelphia, an annuity of thirty pounds, Pennsylvania money, to be paid to him out of the rents and profits of my real estate, on the 25th day of March, in every year, during the joint lives of him, the said Archibald Young, and my son, John Bleakley, or his heirs lawfully begotten. But, in case of the decease of my said son, without issue lawfully begotten as aforesaid, in the life-time of the said Archibald Young, then the said annuity is to cease; and in lieu thereof, I give and bequeath unto the said Archibald Young, and his assigns, the sum of four hundred pounds sterling, payable out of the proceeds of my real estate, when the same is sold and disposed of, according to the intention of this my will, hereinafter mentioned, and before any dividend is made of the proceeds of my said estate. And this legacy or bequest is made to my said cousin, Archibald Young, not only for the natural affection I have and bear to him as a relation, but also as a full compensation for the services he has already rendered me, and in lieu of his commissions for the trouble he may hereafter have in the execution of this my will. All the rest and residue of my estate, real and personal, of what nature, kind or quality the same may be or consist, and hereinbefore not particularly disposed of, I give, *devise, and bequeath to my son, John *498 Bleakley, and his heirs lawfully begotten; and in case of the decease of my said son, without such issue, then I do direct and order my said cousin, Archibald Young, his executors or administrators, to sell and dispose of my real estate, within two years after the decease of my said son, John Bleakley, to the best advantage. And I do hereby give and bequeath the proceeds thereof to my said brothers, David Bleakley and William Bleakley, and my said sisters, Margaret Harkness and Sarah Boyle, and their heirs forever, or such of them as shall be living at the decease of my said son, to be divided between them in equal proportions, share and share alike, after deducting out of such proceeds the sum of 400 pounds sterling, hereinbefore given and bequeathed to the said Archibald Young, immediately on the decease of my said son without issue in lieu of the annuity above mentioned. And in case my said son should die before he attains the age of twenty-one years, without issue lawfully begotten, as aforesaid, then my will and mind is, that the remainder of my personal estate, hereby intended for my said son at his own disposal, if he should live to attain the age of twenty-one years, shall go to, and be divided amongst my said brothers and sisters, with the proceeds of my real estate, as is hereinbefore directed to be divided. And I do hereby nominate and appoint the said Archibald Young, and my said son, John Bleakley, executors of this my will, hereby revoking, and making void, all former wills, codicils, and bequests, by me, at any time or times *here- *499 tofore made, and do ordain this will to be as and for my last will and testament. In witness whereof," &c.

The testator died in the month of January, 1769. His brothers and sisters all died, leaving children (who are still alive), at or about the following periods, viz.: Sarah Boyle between the years 1760 and 1770; William in the year 1775; David in the year 1790, and Margaret Harkness in the year 1794. The children were of full age, or nearly so, when the above will was made, and were personally known to the testator. Archibald Young died in May, 1782, having duly made and executed his last will and testament, whereby he appointed Robert Correy his executor, who, on the 24th of April, 1797, made his last will and testament, and thereof appointed Eleanor Curry and James Boyd the executors, and died in June, 1802.

John Bleakley, the son, died on the 3d of September, 1802, without issue, and of full age, having previously executed his last will and testament, whereof he appointed J. P. Norris his executor, and thereby directed his real and personal estate to be sold, and the proceeds, after paying certain legacies, to be divided among certain of his relations. On the 25th of May, 1803, the said Norris, for a valuable consideration, sold and conveyed the premises in dispute to W. Folwell, who, on the 21st of April, 1810, conveyed the same for a valuable consideration to the defendant. On the 1st of February, 1805, Eleanor Curry and James Boyd, the executors 500* of R. Correy (who was the *executor of A. Young), by deed, bargained and sold the premises in question to James Smith, which deed was afterwards canceled; and subsequently, on the 27th of March, 1820, they sold and conveyed the said premises to the lessor of the plaintiff, who, at the time of his purchase, had notice of the death of the brothers and sisters of John Bleakley, in the life-time of his son.

Upon this special verdict, judgment having been rendered, pro forma, for the defendant, in the court below, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Mr. Wheaton, for the plaintiff, stated that the will of J. Bleakley, Senior, was, in effect, a devise of an estate tail to the testator's son, with a remainder over to his executor, A. Young, &c., in trust to sell, in case of the son's dying without issue, and the proceeds to be distributed equally among his brothers and sisters, and their heirs (as a designatio personarum), or such of them as should be living at the son's death. But the first difficulty in the cause was a determination of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, upon an ejectment brought in that court, under the same will. The State Court there held that the words "heirs" was a word of limitation; and none of the brothers and sisters being alive at the death of the son, J. Bleakley, Junior, the object of the power to sell had failed; their issue were not entitled, and a sale by the executors of Young conveyed no title; although it was admitted that the power might 501* be *executed by Young's executors, if the object of sale had continued.<sup>1</sup>

This decision was that of two judges only,<sup>2</sup> and could hardly be considered as a binding authority even in the state courts, whatever respect might be felt for the great abilities of the learned judges by whom it was pronounced. This is not one of those cases where the decisions of the state courts, on questions of local law, establish rules of property, which this court will not disturb; but it is a mere question of the interpretation of a will, depending entirely on the rules of the common law.

There are two questions for consideration: (1) Whether the power or trust, to sell, now exists; and (2) How the distribution of the proceeds of the sale is to be made.

The second question is certainly subordinate to the first. For if there be an absolute power to sell (as will be contended), then the disposition of the fund is a matter to be determined between the trustees and those who may claim it in a court of equity; but it cannot interfere with the paramount authority to sell. But it has been supposed that if the object for creating the fund no longer exists, the power is gone with it. The second question, therefore, will be considered first; not meaning, however, to admit that the one is a corollary from the other. Reasons may have existed <sup>*to</sup> [*502] induce the testator to desire a sale at all events; and the fact of its not being in express terms restricted to any particular event, goes to prove that it was to be made under all circumstances, except only the son's having issue.

Such is the necessary ambiguity of all human language, that particular words used in a will, or any other writing, must be taken in their most usual technical sense or not, according to other considerations. One of the most important of these considerations is the design of the writer, as manifested by the general scope of the writing itself. What, then, was the intention of the testator, and who were the objects of his bounty, as manifested by the will itself? We contend that he intended to devise all his property, and to retain it in his own family. The first and great rule in the exposition of wills, is the intention of the testator expressed, which, if consistent with the rules of law, shall prevail.<sup>3</sup> To this, all other rules are but subsidiary or suppletory.<sup>4</sup> Supposing this to be the design of the testator, the means are appropriate to the end. He gives to his cousin, A. Young, a small pecuniary annuity, burthened with onerous duties; and to his son, the mere usufruct of the residue, unless he should have children; in which event only the restraint on alienation is removed.

The first great object of the testator's bounty, <sup>*then</sup>, was his son. The second class [*503] of objects was his brothers and sisters; and the third class was the children of his brothers and sisters.

Had the brothers and sisters survived the son, they would unquestionably have succeeded, by the executory devise, on the occurrence of the sole contingency, viz., the death of the son, without issue lawfully begotten. Did the devise extend beyond the brothers and sisters? It is clear that it was not, it terms, restricted to the brothers and sisters personally; the terms of it contemplate something more. The words are, "to my said brothers, &c., and my said sisters, &c., and their heirs forever, or such of them as shall be living at the decease of my said son, to be divided between them in equal proportions, share and share alike." Whatever may be the technical meaning of the word heirs, &c., the use of them certainly shows that the testator looked beyond the brothers and sisters. The opposite construction rejects words which the testator has thought fit to use; and it is a well-established principle, that no words in a will shall be rejected that can bear any construction.<sup>1</sup> The opposite argument must also take for granted that the words, "such of them as shall be living," &c., refer to brothers and sisters merely. But this supposition is contradicted, both by fair grammatical construction, and the general scope of the will. Fiat relatio proximis antecedenti: the word "them" is in immediate juxtaposition 504*] with the word "heirs." The whole scope and object of the will is to provide for the family; and to restrict this devise to the brothers and sisters, is to defeat this object. The intention of the testator was evidently to dispose of his property, not to leave it floating and precarious. The death of his brothers and sisters was naturally to have been expected; but of their children, some of them would probably be alive, should the son die without issue. It was not for the purpose of giving a fee-simple that the word "heirs" was introduced; for it was personal property which was devised, and which would pass absolutely without words of inheritance. The children of his brothers and sisters were personally well known and dear to him. They were, therefore, the natural objects of his bounty; and this extrinsic circumstance may aid in the construction.

But what is the meaning of the word "heirs" as coupled with the words "brothers and sisters?" It may mean, (1) Heirs at law; in which case, whilst it bears the most technical meaning, it will consist with a liberal and rational interpretation. The proceeds go to the brothers, &c. If any of them are dead, to the heir at law of the deceased, standing in loco parentis, and the surviving brothers, &c. If all are dead, leaving children, to the heirs at law of all. If all are dead, and some have left no children, and therefore, no heirs at law, except the children of the others, then to the surviving heirs at law. (2) Or it may mean children. It is thus used in popular discourse, and writings 505*] not technical: If children, then "heirs," says St. Paul.<sup>2</sup> The testator himself uses it in this sense, in at least one other part of his will. He says: "I give and bequeath to my son, John Bleakley, and his heirs lawfully begotten; and in case of his decease without such issue," &c. And this use of the word is perfectly legal. Thus, in Jones v. Morgan: "It is first necessary to determine upon the whole of the will, whether, by the word heirs, the testator meant that succession of persons so denominated by the law. If that appears to be the intention, the rule in Shelly's case must, in all events, take place. But when the word is used in any other sense, the rule is not applicable, and the limitation must have its effect, as if proper words had been made use of."<sup>3</sup> So, in Bamfield v. Popham, "It was agreed that the word heirs was not always, and of necessity, to be intended as a word of limitation. Thus, in 2 Ventr., 311, a devise to A for life, remainder to the heirs male of the body of A, now living; these were words of purchase. So, in Raym., 279, Lisle v. Gray (1 Jones, 114), lands were limited to A for life, &c., the words heirs male, were understood to signify sons."<sup>4</sup> And in Darbison v. Beaumont: "Devise to the heirs male of J. S. begotten. J. S. having a son, and the testator taking notice that J. S. was then living, a sufficient description of [*506 testator's meaning, and such son shall take, though (strictly speaking) he is not heir." "As to the objection, that Mr. Long being living, there could not, in a legal sense, be any heir male, &c., it was answered that the intent of the testator, by the devise (which was the only matter in question), did plainly appear, &c. That the word heir had, in law, several significations; in the strictest, it signified one who had succeeded to a dead ancestor; but in a more general sense, it signified an heir apparent, which supposes the ancestor to be living; and in this latter sense, the word heir is frequently used in statutes, law books, and records."<sup>5</sup> By way of analogy, it may also be mentioned that the word "issue" is frequently taken as a descriptio personarum.<sup>6</sup>

The rule in Shelly's case has been frequently broken in upon in favor of last wills. Once fix the intention, and the word heirs may as well be a word of purchase, as a word of limitation. And it may even be taken as a word of purchase in a deed, if such be the intention of the grantor.<sup>7</sup> So, also, in marriage articles.<sup>8</sup> This is not upon the principle that the rules of property are different *in [*507 chancery from what they are at law; that notion was long since completely exploded.<sup>9</sup> But the rule has been still more frequently relaxed in the case of devises, for very obvious reasons.<sup>10</sup> Several attempts have been made, both by judges and elementary writers, to classify the cases in which, by an exception to the rule, the word heirs is construed as a word of purchase; but all the exceptions will be found to turn upon the intention of the testator. And when it is said that this intention must not be contrary to the rules of law, this dictum does not apply to the technical sense of the terms used by the testator. It merely applies to the legality of the object which he wishes to effect. e. g. The testator wishes to create a perpetuity; any words, however untechnical, which import the idea, are sufficient; but the law will not permit a perpetuity to be created at all. This distinction is clearly stated by Lord Keeper Henley. "It was argued that if the intent was plain, yet, if the testator had used words which, by the rules of law, imported a different signification, the rule of law, and not the intent, would prevail; but there was no such rule applicable to this case. In case of a will, the intent shall prevail, if not contrary to law; the meaning of which is, if the limitations are such as the law allows; but it does not mean that the words must be taken in such signification as the law imposed on them. If 508*] words, which, in *consideration of law, were generally taken as words of limitation, appear in a will to be very plainly intended as words of purchase, they must be considered as such both in courts of law and equity."<sup>1</sup>

But admitting, argumenti gratia, that if the children of the testator's brothers and sisters take in character of heirs, they must take in quality of heirs, i. e., by descent; they may take in this manner consistently with the rules of law. Either it is a contingent executory devise to their parents, or, as it is commonly called, an executory interest; or it is a contingency or possibility coupled with an interest. In the first case, although the devisees die before the contingency happens, their children will take by descent.<sup>2</sup> If it be a contingency or possibility coupled with an interest, they may take in the same manner.<sup>3</sup> It is now the settled text law, that these contingent estates are transmissible to the heirs of the devisee, where such devisee dies before the contingency happens, and if not disposed of before, will vest in such heirs when the contingency happens; 509*] though formerly *an opinion prevailed that they could not pass by a will made previous to their vesting.<sup>4</sup>

If it should be objected that this is a double contingency, which is bad, the answer is, that there is no rule of law which prohibits a limitation on a double contingency, or a contingency on another contingency. A limitation may be good, though made to depend on any number of contingencies, if they be collateral to, or independent of, each other, and may all happen within the legal time of limitation. In Routledge v. Dorrit,<sup>5</sup> a grandchild took on a limitation dependent on no less than four contingencies.

It is a well-established doctrine that where a class or denomination of heirs, indefinitely, are intended to be embraced, the word heirs is a word of limitation; but where particular or special persons are constituted the stock of a new descent, it operates as a word of purchase.<sup>6</sup> Here the devise is to the brothers and sisters, and such of their heirs as may be living at a particular time. Heirs general, therefore, could not have been meant; but only the heirs of each brother, and of each sister, i. e., the children of each brother and sister. The term is restricted (supposing it to be a devise of the realty) to such as should be heir *of [510 such of the brothers and sisters as were dead when J. Bleakley, Jun., died without leaving issue. The heirship must be established by the known canons of descent; but when ascertained, the objects defined would still take by purchase. The word heirs is, indeed, a word of limitation, for the purpose of ascertaining who are to take; but after it has performed that office, the objects who are to take are in by purchase, and not by descent. And herein, it is humbly apprehended, consists the radical defect in the argument of the learned judges of the State Court. If the word heirs necessarily compelled all who take under it, to take in quality of heirs, then the argument that they must take per stirpes, and not per capita, might have its difficulties. But this word does not operate, exclusively, either as a word of purchase, or of limitation. That it is often a word of purchase has been before shown; and in the common case of a devise "to A for life, remainder to the heirs of B, who leaves a daughter, and his wife enfeinte with a son. On the death of B, the daughter takes, under the description of heir, by purchase, and she shall not be divested by the subsequent birth of the son."<sup>7</sup> So, also, in the case of an estate to A for life, remainder to the right heirs of B, or of an executory devise to the right heirs of A. The canons of descent are referred to for the purpose of ascertaining who are the right heirs; and after this is ascertained, such persons *take by purchase. It does not follow, [511 that because the word heirs is a word of limitation, that the heirs, when ascertained, must take as heirs; for there are many cases where terms of limitation operate only sub modo as such, viz., for the purpose of defining the objects who are to take in quality of purchasers. Thus, if a remainder be limited in gavelkind, or borough English lands, to the right heirs of A, the common law points out the eldest son as the heir, contrary to the custom, which gives the land in the one case to all the sons, and in the other to the youngest son. "For," says Mr. Watkins, "notwithstanding we may thus have recourse to the law of descents to ascertain the persons who are to take, yet, when they are once ascertained, they take as purchasers."<sup>8</sup> So, if lands be devised to the right heirs of A, who leaves two daughters, they are both his heirs; but they take not as parceners (for to do this they must take by descent), but as joint-tenants, or in common, i. e., as purchasers.<sup>1</sup> In general, purchasers take per capita, and those who claim by descent, take per stirpes; but if the intention of the grantor or deviser can be better promoted by purchasers taking per stirpes than per capita, there is no inflexible rule of law to prevent it. In the present case, we hold that the intention is plain, and that all claiming as heirs of those brothers and sisters 512* would take per stirpes, even *though they take by purchase; but whether they take in one way or the other is quite immaterial, provided it be shown that the brothers and sisters personally were not the sole objects of the testator's bounty, and consequently need not survive J. Bleakley, Jun.

The same construction has been adopted, respecting personal property, under the statute of distributions, 29 Charles II., c. 3. Where there is a bequest of personalty to the relations or next of kin of A, the statute furnishes the rule; i. e., ascertains who are the persons comprehended within these words; and these persons may take per capita, though if distributed, in such case, under the statute, they would take per stirpes.<sup>2</sup>

That these children are entitled to take, as purchasers, under the word heirs, is manifest, as none can claim by descent, unless the subject of the limitation vests, or might have vested, in the ancestor, qua ancestor. But here no estate, in land, was ever contemplated to vest in the brothers or sisters named, or in either of them. The entire estate, in the land vested either in Bleakley, Jun., or in Young, the executor, &c., and the proceeds of a sale, i. e., personalty only, was to be paid over to such persons as satisfied the description entitled at the time of Bleakley, Jun., his death without issue. Under no possible circumstances or view of the case could these children take in quality of heirs; because nothing ever did or could vest in their parents as ancestors; and 513* the *subject itself of the devise was not real property, but money, of which heirship cannot with legal accuracy be predicated. It is, therefore, manifest, that if they take at all, it must be as purchasers, and that the word heirs may be used for the purpose of ascertaining who are embraced within the scope of the testator's bounty; and having performed that duty, it is functus officio, and ceases to operate as a word of limitation.<sup>3</sup>

The next question in the cause is, whether the power to sell exists in those who have exercised it, and under a sale from whom the plaintiff claims title.

And this divides itself into two inquiries: (1) Whether there is in any person, now existing, an authority to sell. (2) Whether the event has taken place, which, in the contemplation of the testator, was to occasion its exercise.

1. It is a familiar principle, that no execution of a trust shall fail for want of a trustee. On a total failure, chancery will appoint one; but if the individual named by the testator is wanting, it devolves on the person who succeeds to the general rights and duties with which it is coupled. Here the direction of the testator himself extends it beyond the first individual named. The trust, as it is created, extends not only to the executors, but to the administrators of A. Young, who may be total strangers. But even if it were not so, the power given to one will extend by operation *and construction of law to his execu- *514 tors, and so on from executor to executor.<sup>4</sup> And, by the local law of Pennsylvania, the distinction between a power to sell, and a devise of the land to be sold, is taken away, and the executors have the same interest in the one case as in the other.<sup>5</sup> The remainder in fee, then, on the death of Bleakley, Jun., vested in the executors, &c., for the purpose of sale. The will of the testator was that it should be sold on the occurrence of that event. It is immaterial for what reason. It is sufficient that it was his will. The direction to sell is mandatory, and not a mere discretionary authority. The time within which it was to be performed is immaterial. Its performance might have been retarded by many accidents.

2. The event has occurred, which, in the contemplation of the testator, was to occasion the exercise of the power to sell. The language of the will on this point is unambiguous and clear. "In case of the decease of my said son without issue, then I do direct and order," &c. It is made to depend on the single event of his decease without issue. How the proceeds are to be distributed is another and a distinct question. They are not made dependent upon each other. If the brothers and sisters had all lived, they could not have entered into possession of the real property; they could *only have compelled an execution of *515 the trust, by the preliminary measure of a sale.

Mr. Sergeant, contra, stated that this case had been submitted to the highest court of Pennsylvania, where it was decided against the title, now in question, so long since as 1809. He admitted that a verdict and judgment in ejectment were not conclusive, and that a second ejectment might be brought on the same title. But the decision of a competent court of the highest resort, solemnly rendered on a question of law, submitted to them by the parties, ought to be decisive of what the law is on that question, as between the parties, and all claiming under them with notice. It would be conclusive on that court, and on all inferior jurisdictions; and where there is concurrent jurisdiction, the rule is that the tribunal which first gets possession has exclusive possession of the cause and of its incidents. Here the question was upon the law of Pennsylvania, as it regarded land in that state; not the statute law, which is written, but the common law, as shown by the decisions of her courts, and modified by usage and custom, or the peculiar adoption and application of its principles. Had this case been first submitted to the Circuit Court, and brought here by appeal, a decision of the Supreme Court of the state, in another case, in all respects similar, would be of the highest authority. And it is fit that it should be so for the sake of uniformity in the settlement of the law; or else, the peculiar judicial constitution of this country might be 516*] productive *of the greatest confusion. Suppose the decision of this court should be different from that of the State Court; it is not a case in which, by the constitution and laws of the Union, this court has any superiority that would give its decision a binding effect. There would, consequently, be an irreconcilable conflict of decisions. The decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania must therefore be regarded as of the highest authority, and ought to be followed, unless flatly absurd and unjust.

But, considering the will, independent of the authority of the decision in the State Court, it is obvious that the testator did not mean to provide for the disposition of his estate, in every event that might happen, except by the residuary clause in favor of his son. If he had said, or had clearly intimated, that he meant in no case to die intestate, so as to let in the heir, this might have been considered as a pervading intention that would influence the interpretation of the will. But this was not necessary, for the law had provided an heir, in whose favor the affections of the testator would coincide with the provisions of the law. The heir is a favorite of the common law, and is not to be disinherited but by express words, or by necessary implication. That implication can only exist where there is a plain intention not to die intestate. But here the intention was merely to provide for certain persons, whom the testator, for reasons known only to himself, chose to consider as objects of his bounty, in certain events. So far he meant to 517*] restrain *his son, and no further. From his having done so, it is impossible to infer an intention to provide for other persons, or for other events, as there might be, in a case where there was a manifest design not to die intestate.

The will must be interpreted by itself, and then it will appear that the testator had in view: (1) His son, to whom he gives a clear estate tail in the realty, and an absolute estate in the personalty, on certain terms. (2) A. Young, to whom he gives an annuity of £30 a year, during the joint lives of himself and the son, or the son's issue; and to whom, in the event of his surviving the son, and the son dying without issue, or the issue failing in his life-time, he gives £400 in lieu of the annuity, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of his estate. A. Young could then, certainly, take nothing but in the case specified of the son dying without issue, or the issue failing in the life-time of Young. It is put in place of the annuity, and, in case of issue, the annuity is to be continued. (3) The brothers and sisters of the testator. If the son die, leaving A. Young, the right of A. Young is vested; and then (i.e., A. Young surviving the son, and the son dying without issue) the testator's will is that the property shall be sold by A. Young, his executor, &c., and the proceeds, after paying his £400 to the four brothers and sisters, by name, and their heirs, or such of them as shall be living at the son's decease. And that this was

We say, then, that the power to sell was limited to arise upon the contingency: (1) Of John, the son, dying without issue in the life-time of A. Young, or of the issue failing in the life-time of A. Young; or (2) Of his dying without issue, living one or more of the brothers or sisters of the testator. And that neither of these contingencies having happened, the fee, which was in the son by descent, was discharged from the power, and was devised by his will.

But it may be asked, why should the disposition in favor of the brothers and sisters be made dependent upon the life of A. Young? The answer is, because it was first and chiefly for the sake of A. Young that the sale was to be made; and there is no more reason, as regards the intention of the testator, for limiting the disposition in case of issue failing, than in case of the son's dying leaving no issue. And yet the former is clearly done, and was indispensable. Suppose J. Bleakley, Jun., had left a child who survived A. Young one day and then died. The reversion in fee would then go to the heir of John, the son, so as to merge and destroy the estate tail, and all intermediate contingent estates.<sup>1</sup> The contingent limitation is only good by way of executory devise. J. Bleakley, Jun., took a vested estate tail by the will, and the reversion in fee by descent. The descent was immediate, liable to open and let in the power, *upon the happening of [519 the contingency upon which the power was to arise. After the failure of the estate tail, the fee would be in the son and his heirs, until the power was exercised, no estate being given to A. Young. This could only be done by executory devise.<sup>2</sup> There is no preceding particular estate to support the remainder. The fee by descent is no particular estate. It must therefore be considered a contingent limitation, good only by way of executory devise. As a contingent remainder, it might be barred by common recovery, but not as an executory devise.<sup>3</sup> It is, besides, the creation of an estate of freehold, to commence in futuro, by the exercise of a power collateral to the estate, and therefore also must be an executory devise. As an executory devise cannot be destroyed by an alteration of the preceding limitation, nor barred by a recovery, to avoid perpetuity, the contingency must be one to happen within a reasonable time, i. e., a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years and a few months thereafter.

Now, let us consider whether it is so limited, and what the limitation is. Dying without issue, or failure of issue, legally imports an indefinite failure of issue, as it respects both personal and real estate, but especially the latter, "for there the interest of the heir is concerned, which is always much favored at law."<sup>4</sup> In the case of personal *estate, it has in- [520 deed been often construed to mean a dying without issue living at the time of the death. And in the case of real estate, it has been sometimes so construed. But this has been only from necessity, to support the limitations over, and effectuate the legal intention of the testator.<sup>1</sup> And it has therefore never been so construed where there was an express limitation in the will to the contrary, or of equivalent legal effect. Where, then, there is a limitation sufficient to maintain and preserve the subsequent dispositions, such implication is unnecessary. And where there is a limitation expressed, inconsistent with such implied limitation, the implication is impossible. Such inconsistency is equally great, whether the actual limitation is shorter or longer than the implied limitation. The limitation in this will is the dying of J. Bleakley, Jun., without issue, in the life-time of A. Young; which includes his so dying, leaving no issue, or leaving issue which failed in the life-time of A. Young. It is not a double contingency, but a single contingency embracing both events. The limitation, too, is sufficient to support the ultimate disposition. If so, there can be no limitation to dying without issue, &c. The words are: "I give to my cousin, A. Young, &c., an annuity, &c., during the joint lives of him, the said A. Young, and my son, J. Bleakley, or his heirs lawfully begotten; but in case of the decease of my said son without issue lawfully begotten, as aforesaid," &c.

If it be said that the subsequent words, which contain the disposition in favor of the brothers and sisters, are different, "and in case of the decease of my said son without such issue," and ought to be construed a dying without issue living at the time of his death, I answer that they cannot be so interpreted here; because, (1) They are connected with the antecedent words in the prior part of the will, "hereinafter mentioned, and before any dividend is made of the proceeds of my said estate;" and with the words in the subsequent part, "after deducting out of the proceeds," &c. (2) It would make the bequest to A. Young depend upon one contingency, and that to the brothers and sisters upon another; whereas, they are plainly connected together, and made to depend upon one contingency. (3) These same identical words are before used as equivalent to a failure of issue; "during the joint lives of him, the said A. Young, and my son, J. B., or his heirs lawfully begotten; but in case of the decease of my said son without issue," &c.

As a limitation, the life of his brothers and sisters, who were in esse, would answer equally well as the life of A. Young. But it must be admitted that there is no express limitation of that kind in the will. And it would follow that if there be not a limitation to the life of A. Young, there is none at all.

Under this head, however, I shall contend, (1) That the distribution was to be made [*522] among such of the brothers and sisters as should be living at the time when the contingency happened. (2) As none were then living, and A. Young was dead, there was no object for the exercise of the power, and therefore the power was never brought into existence.

Such was the opinion of a majority of the judges of the State Court; and it is the natural and obvious reading of the will. The proceeds are given to the brothers and sisters by name, to be divided between them in equal proportions, share and share alike; which imports that he had some definite idea whom it was to be divided amongst. But, if there were any doubt, the bequest of the personal estate, which refers to the former, makes it quite plain. The legal construction is the same; for it cannot be denied that heirs is, generally, a word of limitation, and only descriptive of the quantity of estate meant to be given. Strike out the words "and their heirs forever," and all doubt is dissipated. Strike out the words of contingency, "or such of them as shall be living at the decease of my said son," and would not the whole vest in the ancestor, and the heir take by descent? In either case, suppose one to die in the life-time of the testator, would not the legacy lapse? But the words "for ever," unequivocally stamps the character of limitation. The supposition that heirs is to be a word of purchase, in one event only, goes on the ground that the same word is to be construed, according to circumstances, in senses entirely different. That is to say, that in the mind of the testator, and at the time of making the [*523] will, it was understood to be a word both of limitation and of purchase. It would follow, then, that if one of the brothers and sisters died in the life-time of the testator, the heir would take by purchase. There could therefore be no such thing as a lapsed legacy or devise, if the word heirs be used; and some new mode must be invented of describing the quantity of the estate.

This construction is liable to another objection, that it strikes out an entire clause. It is manifest enough that the testator thought it was real estate, and therefore used the word heirs. He might well think so, as it was to be real estate up to a certain point. How this estate was to be regarded, might not have been generally understood at the time when this will was made. It was probably Lord Hardwicke who first decided that land to be converted into money, or money to be laid out in land, were to be considered "by the transmutation of a court of equity."<sup>2</sup> Besides, the legatee might, in such case, perhaps, have an election.<sup>3</sup> At law, it is still real estate; that is, supposing A. Young to be either dead, or his legacy paid. And it deserves to be remarked, that the testator drops these words, when he speaks of what he himself deems personal estate.

Our construction is the only reasonable and practicable one. Heirs, standing alone, is never a word of purchase; and when it is a word of purchase, it always means [*524] that the heir is to take in exclusion of the ancestor.<sup>4</sup> Thus, where an estate is given to the ancestor for life, the heir may take by purchase, so that the estates will not unite. Where the ancestor takes no estate at all, an heir may take by purchase, as the first taker; the word heir being then a descriptio personæ, or individual designation.

But supposing it to be otherwise, we must take one of two alternatives: (1) That if some of the brothers and sisters were living, and some dead, those who were living, and the heirs of those who were dead, should take. In that case, the heirs must take per capita as purchasers. (2) That if the brothers and sisters were all dead, the heirs of all would take. In this case, also, they must take per capita. That could not be the intention. But even as words of purchase, heirs, standing alone, and without qualification, is a designation only of the person or persons who, by law, are heirs. It can never mean children or issue.<sup>1</sup> Then what heir is it to be? The heir by the law of Ireland, of England, or of Pennsylvania? If restricted to the issue of the brothers and sisters (which is a still further construction), and all are to take equally, then there might be every possible variety in the circumstances and character of these children, which must have been unknown to the testator, and are unknown to the court. But there is a flat legal 525* bar to such a construction; *and that is, that the limitation to the children would be upon a double contingency, which is bad.

But it is said that the contingent interest is descendible, and would go to the children. Doubtless it might; but that must depend upon the nature of the contingency.

If, then, A. Young being dead, and all the brothers and sisters being dead, there was no object remaining for the power, did the power itself ever come into existence? It never existed in A. Young, because he died before the contingency happened; and it could not be derived from him to his executors or administrators. But supposing it might; then, at law, it expired at the end of two years from the death of J. Bleakley, Jun., and before the deed to Smith.<sup>2</sup> To be sure, equity would not suffer it to perish, if there were objects for its exercise. But, even in equity, it expired with the expiration of its object.<sup>3</sup> Here all the objects were completely at an end.

It is, however, contended, that the use is subordinate to the power, and the sale is to be made at all events. But that makes the end subservient to the means. The purpose was contingent, and therefore the power was made contingent. No good purpose is to be answered by prolonging the *existence of the power. It may, perhaps, only be meant that the whole is to be considered as the personal estate of the testator, and go according to the statute of distributions. The consequence would then be that he would die intestate. But there is no case which goes so far, and no reason for it. If it were personal estate at the death of Bleakley, Jun., then it all goes to him by will; and he surviving A. Young, and the brothers and sisters of the testator, took the whole absolutely in possession. He would have the right of election, and he makes his election by his will.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, for the plaintiff, in reply, argued that the adjudication in the state court had no other authority here than the opinion of the same learned men would have upon any other question of general law. It was not conclusive, as a resjudicata, even in the state court; and by what magic could the doctrines on which it was founded be considered as conclusive in another forum? A judgment in ejectment is never conclusive at law; and how can a decision in another suit, on the same devise, or another devise, be considered as conclusive on a tribunal having concurrent jurisdiction? The question was not upon the local law, of which the state courts are the exclusive expounders; it arose not upon the statute, or the common law of Pennsylvania (if any such there be), but upon that law which is expounded at Westminster and at Washington.

The intention of the testator is the great polar star in the interpretation of wills. If *527 there be ambiguity in the particular words used by the testator, you may not only look at the general scope and design of the will, as manifested on its face, but you may go out of the will, and inquire into the state of the testator's family, in order to ascertain whether particular persons might probably be the object of his bounty.<sup>4</sup> It would be strange, indeed, if wills were the only writings in which the necessary imperfection of human language might not be supplied by a view of all those extrinsic considerations which may be supposed to have influenced the writer's mind, and caused him to use words in one sense or another. It appears in the case, that the testator had just left his relations in Ireland, his native country, where his brothers and sisters and their children, then were, the latter being of age, or nearly so, and that his will was made in London, on his way to this, his adopted country. Next to his son, his brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces, were probably nearest his heart.

It is admitted that the son took an estate tail. The question has been supposed to be, what became of the reversion on the failure of issue? But whether it descended on the son, or was devised to the testator's brothers and sisters is immaterial; because, the question is, whether the fee, in whomsoever it may now be, is still subject to the power of sale created by the will. He might charge the reversion after the estate tail *had expired. And he has not only *528 empowered, but ordered and directed A. Young, his executors, &c., to sell. His object, doubtless, was to convert the real property into money, in order that it might go to his relations in Ireland, who would probably never come to this country. If a testator says, "I will my heir shall sell the land, and does not mention for what purpose, it is in the breast of the heir at law whether he will sell it or no, &c. But when a testator appoints an executor to sell, his office shows that it is intended to be turned into personal assets, without leaving any resulting trust in the heir."<sup>5</sup>

It is apparent that the testator considered himself as disposing of personal property. The subsequent legacy of his personal estate shows that he considered it as one common fund. It is a mistake to suppose that Lord Hardwicke established for the first time, in 1746, the rule of equity, that land devised to be sold and converted into money, shall be considered as personal property. Such had always been the doctrine of the Court of Chancery. The order to sell is absolute, not coupled with any condition whatsoever, nor depending on the lives of his brothers and sisters. If nothing had been said about the distribution of the proceeds, they would go of course to the personal representatives. The subsequent clause is merely intended to describe how the proceeds were to be divided, and not to indicate the quantity of interest in what had thus become *personal property by its very destination before it had been actually sold. As to the word heirs, it must surrender its ordinary technical meaning in order to subserve the intention. And it is clear that it may be a word of purchase wherever it is necessary for that purpose. Thus, it sometimes means children, and sometimes issue indefinitely.<sup>1</sup> If the words "their heirs" were stricken out of this clause, the property being personal, would be vested absolutely in the brothers and sisters. The words, therefore, must have been added for some other purpose than to create a limitation. All the legatees, except one, and probably that one, were alive at the death of the testator. There was, then, no lapsed legacy. There was a clear contingent remainder to the brothers and sisters, which was transmissible to their representatives. The words "their heirs forever" were intended as words of purchase, and to substitute the children or grandchildren for the original parents, in order to effect the great intention of the testator, which was, to keep the estate in his own family. He supposed he had prevented his son from aliening it by the entail, and that he had provided for the case of his son's dying without issue, by the direction to sell, and the disposition of the proceeds. All his intentions are to be frustrated by the construction contended for on the other side.

As to the supposed difficulties about the distribution of the proceeds among those who are entitled, that question is not now before the court. [*530] *It is sufficient that there is an object for the present exercise of the power. It is immaterial in what proportions those who are entitled are to take. When they shall file their bill on the equity side of the court, it will be time enough to consider that question.

The case cited from the year book, 15 Hen. VII., has nothing to do with the present question. That was a feoffment, on condition that the feoffee, who was the party in interest, should aliene; and not the case of a trust. The time within which the power was to be executed is immaterial, it being merely incidental to the general object of the testator. Suppose the executor of A. Young, and all the others by whom the power was to have been executed, had neglected or refused; are the cestuis que trust to be disappointed? Would not a court of equity compel the execution, or supply the defective execution? And if so, will it not confirm what has been already done? It may indeed be admitted that the trust will not be enforced, or the execution of it confirmed, if the object for which it was created no longer exists. But here the first object was to convert the real property into money, and then to distribute it. But if the property is to be considered as real estate, it would vest in him who was heir at law of the original donor, at the time of the expiration of the particular estate. J. Bleakley, Jun., had, indeed, a right to dispose of this reversionary interest, but he never exercised that right. There *is nothing in his will showing [*531 an intention to devise it.<sup>2</sup>

Mr. Justice WASHINGTON delivered the opinion of the court, and after stating the case, proceeded as follows:

The material question to be decided is, whether the power given to A. Young, his executors and administrators, to sell the real estate of the testator, was legally exercised? If it was not, then the plaintiff in error, who claims under a sale made by the executor of Young, acquired no title under it, and the judgment below is right.

It was contended by the counsel for the defendant, that by the death of Young, as well as of the brothers and sisters of the testator, in the life-time of John Bleakley, the son, the devises to them to arise out of the power to sell never took effect; and consequently, there being no person in existence, at the death of the son, to receive the proceeds of the sale, or any part of them, the power was unduly exercised. The premises upon which the above argument is founded, as well as the conclusion drawn from them, being controverted by the counsel on the other side, our inquiries will be confined to those two points.

With respect to the devise of the £400 to A. Young, a majority of the court is of opinion that by the words, as well as from the obvious intention of the testator, that sum was not to be raised except in the event of the death of John *Bleakley, the son, without issue, [*532 in the life-time of Young. During the joint lives of the son, or his issue, and Young, the latter was to receive an annuity of £30 out of the rents and profits of the real estate. But if the son should die without issue in the life-time of the said Young, the annuity was, in that event, to cease, and the £400 was to be raised for his use, out of the proceeds of the real estate, when the same should be sold, according to the intention of the will, as thereafter mentioned. The contingency on which the devise of the £400 was to take effect, is in no respect connected with that on which the devise of the proceeds to the brothers and sisters was to depend. The £400 is expressly given in lieu of the annuity, in case Young should survive the son, without issue, in which event it was to cease.

The contingency upon which the devise of the proceeds of the real estate to the brothers and sisters was to take effect, was the death of the son without issue; and since it was possible that the particular estate of the son might endure beyond the life of Young, the power to sell, for the benefit of the brothers and sisters, is extended to his executors and administrators. It is true that by the clause which gives the power to sell, taken independent of the devise to Young, it would seem as if the £400 was, at all events, to be first deducted out of the proceeds of the sale, and paid to him, in the same event as the residue was to be paid to the brothers and sisters; that is, on the death of the son 533*] without issue. But the *two clauses must of necessity be taken in connection with each other, the one as containing the bequest to Young, and the contingency upon which it was to take effect; and the other, as pointing out the fund out of which it was to be satisfied. If the former never took effect, it is clear that the latter was relieved from the burthen imposed upon it.

A very good reason appears for making the devise of the £400 to Young, to depend upon his surviving the son without issue, since it would be in that event only that he would want it; the annuity, which it was intended to replace, continuing until that event happened. But no reason is perceived why the devise over to the brothers and sisters of the testator, or the execution of the power for their benefit, should have been made to depend on the same event, a trustee to sell being provided in the executors of Young, in case he should die before the power could be executed.

Having shown, it is believed, that the devise of the £400 to Young never took effect, in consequence of his death in the life-time of John Bleakley, the son, it becomes important to inquire whether the devise to the brothers and sisters of the testator failed, in consequence of their having all died in the life-time of the son. The operative words of the will are: "I give the proceeds thereof [of his real estate] to my said brothers and sisters, and their heirs, forever, or such of them as shall be living at the 534*] decease of my son, to be divided *between them in equal proportions, share and share alike."

The court has felt considerable difficulty in construing the above clause, with a view to the intention of the testator, to be collected from the whole of the will, and of the circumstances stated in the special verdict. Some of the judges are of opinion that the devise is confined, both by the words and by the apparent intention of the testator, to the brothers and sisters who should be living at the death of the son without issue, considering the word "heirs" as a word of limitation, according to its general import, and that there is no evidence of an intention in the testator to give the part of a deceased brother or sister to his or her children, which ought to control the legal meaning of that word, when used as it is in this clause. On the contrary, they think that the use of it in the devise of the proceeds of the real estate, and the omission of it in the devise of the personal estate, and yet declaring that the latter is to be divided amongst his brothers and sisters, with the proceeds of his real estate as thereinbefore directed to be divided, strongly indicates the intention of the testator to give the proceeds of the real estate to the same persons who were to take the personal estate. Others of the judges are of opinion that an intention to give the proceeds of the real estate to the children of a deceased brother or sister, as representing their ancestor, is fairly to be collected from the will, which strongly intimates that the testator did not *mean to die intestate, as to any part of [535 his real or personal estate.

Upon a question of so much doubt, this court, which always listens with respect to the adjudications of the courts of the different states, where they apply, is disposed, upon this point, to acquiesce in the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Smith's lessee v. Folwell (1 Bin., 546), that the word heirs is to be construed to be a word of limitation, and consequently, that the devise to the brothers and sisters failed to take effect by their deaths in the life-time of the son.

Whether the conclusion to which that court came, and which was pressed upon us by the plaintiff's counsel—that the contingencies on which the power to sell was to arise, having never happened, the sale under the power was without authority—is well founded in a court of law, need not be decided in this case, because the majority of the court are of opinion that, by the express words of the will, the sale was limited to the period of two years after the decease of John Bleakley, the son. The circumstance of time was no doubt considered by the testator as being of some consequence, or else it is not likely that he would so have restricted the exercise of the power. But whether it was so or not, such was the will and pleasure of the creator of the power, and that will could only be fulfilled by a precise and literal exercise of the power. The trustee acts, and could act, only in virtue of a special authority conferred upon him by the will; he must act, then, in the way, *and under the restrictions [536 which accompany the authority. If an adjudication were wanted to sanction so plain and obvious a principle of law, it is to be found in a case reported in the year book, 15 Hen. VII., 11, 12.

Under what circumstances a court of equity might relieve, in case the trustee should refuse to exercise the power within the prescribed period, or should exercise the same after that period, need not be adverted to in this case, since this is a question arising in a case purely at law.

The sale in this case, then, having been made about eighteen years after the death of John Bleakley, the son, the trustee acted without authority, and the sale and conveyance was absolutely void at law.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON. I have no hesitation in conceding that if all the objects had failed, for which the power in this will was created, the power itself ceased, both at law and in equity. Those objects were,

1. The raising of the legacy of £400 for Young.

2. The sale and distribution of the testator's estate among his own relatives.

If neither of these objects remained to be effected, the power under which the plaintiff makes title was at an end.

The words on which the legacy depends, are these: "But in case of the decease of my said son, without issue, as aforesaid, in the life-time of the said Archibald Young, then the said annuity is to *ccase; and in lieu thereof, [537 I give and bequeath unto the said A. Y., and his assigns, the sum of £400, payable out of the proceeds of my real estate, when the same is sold and disposed of according to the intention of this my will hereinafter mentioned, and before any dividend is made of my said estate."

The question which this clause presents is whether the legacy was given upon the single contingency of the son's death without issue, or upon the double contingency of his death without issue, in the life-time of A. Young.

This question appears to me to be settled by the testator himself; for in a subsequent part of the will, speaking of this same legacy, and of course with reference to the clause bequeathing it, he says "the sum of £400, hereinbefore given and bequeathed to the said A. Young, immediately on the decease of my said son without issue." The testator, then, has attached the construction to his own word; and that the clause containing this bequest will well admit of that construction is obvious; for there is no necessity for joining the first member of the sentence, which contains the double contingency, to the last member, which contains the bequest. And the effect of the will, without this connection (which I cannot but think forced and unnecessary), will be to give the pecuniary legacy absolutely on the event of the son's death without issue, but at the same time to declare that the annuity should no longer run on, whenever this bequest took effect. This would literally be giving it in lieu [*540] of the annuity, and would fully satisfy those words in the will.

Indeed, this construction appears irresistible when we consider another part of the will.

The power to sell is extended to the executors and administrators of A. Young. They, therefore, were authorized to sell, in the event of the death of the son without issue, although he should survive A. Young. Yet we find the testator, when obviously contemplating the event of the son's surviving Young, expressly directing the payment of this legacy before the proceeds should be distributed among his devisees over. This could only be consistent with a bequest upon the single contingency of the son's death without issue, independently of Young's survivorship.

Nor is there the least ground for contending that this bequest is upon a contingency too remote, since the sale and devise over are expressly limited to take effect upon the death of the son, thereby restricting the generality of the words issue and heirs, so as to mean issue living at his death. This, too, is consistent with those acknowledgments of the testator of a debt of gratitude to A. Young, and not only of a debt to accrue, but of a subsisting debt. The annuity is given in presenti, and so is its substitute, the legacy. The words are, "I give and bequeath," thus vesting a present interest, although the payment is deferred to a future time and event. The views of the testator are easily explained: if his son or his issue took the estate, his bounty to Young was to be limited to the annuity. But if it should go over to his [*539] collateral kindred, the testator enlarges his bounty, and gives this substitute for the annuity, at the same time that he frees his estate from a charge that would embarrass the sale.

Nor can I possibly admit the doctrine that the power to sell was either at law, or in equity, limited to the duration of two years after the death of the son without issue. The words are: "Then I direct and order my said cousin, A. Young, his executors and administrators, to sell and dispose of my real estate within two years after the decease of my said son." Here the words are clearly imperative, and their effect is, both to confer the power generally, and to exact the execution of it in two years. The intention of the testator must prevail, both at law and in equity, in construing his words; and when they will admit of a construction which will make the power commensurate with the views of the testator in creating it, I hold that to be the true construction, both in law and equity. It is only when the power given admits not of this latitude by construction, that the aid of courts of equity is resorted to, in order to carry into effect the views of the testator. By possibility, the executors of A. Young may have been minors, or may not have proved his will until the two years had expired, or a sale during that time may have been stayed by injunction, or by the want of purchasers; and it would be difficult to show why, in any one of these events, the power should have ceased. Certainly no reason can be extracted from the provisions of the will, whence an intention could be inferred to restrict the power to sell to the period of two years. Every [*540] thing favors the contrary conclusion. For whose benefit was this injunction to sell within the specified period imposed upon the executor? Clearly for that of the brothers and sisters, in order that, under it, they may have compelled the executor to proceed to sale within the time limited. It would be strange, then, if a provision so clearly intended for their interests, should have put it in the power of the executor, either wilfully, or by laches, to defeat their interests, and let in the heir at law.

This is not the case of a mere naked power; it is a power coupled with a trust. The executor was to sell, that he might possess himself of the value in money and distribute it among the cestuis que trust. In such cases it has been well observed that "the substantial part is to do the thing," and that "powers of this kind have a favorable construction in law, and are not resembled to conditions, which are strictly expounded."

I am, therefore, of opinion, that the words creating this power will well admit of being construed into a general devise of the power, and that the object intended to be answered necessarily requires that construction.

The dictum cited from the year books, therefore (besides that it has not been very correctly translated), has no application to this case: since it supposes the actual restriction under the will, which I deny to be imposed in the present instance, upon the true construction of its words.

Being, therefore, of opinion that both the legacy to Young and the power to sell, subsisted [*541] at the date of the sale to the plaintiff, if these views of the case are sufficient to sustain the sale to the plaintiff; and the subsequent questions would arise only upon the distribution of the remainder of the purchase money, after satisfying the legacy. Nevertheless, I will make a few remarks upon that part of the will which relates to the devise over to the testator's family, since it serves to elucidate, by another application, the principle upon which I have formed my opinion respecting the legacy to A. Young.

On the subject of the devise over to his brothers and sisters, the testator has again been his own expositor. It is very clear that if the words, "or such of them as shall be living at the decease of my said son," stood alone and unexplained, the relative them might be applied grammatically with more propriety to the word "heirs," than to the words "brothers and sisters," and thus, perhaps, give those words the effect of words of purchase. But the testator himself gives these words a distinct application, in the latter part of his will, when disposing of his personal estate, concerning which he says, that it shall be "divided among my brothers and sisters, with the proceeds of my real estate, as hereinbefore directed to be divided." Under the words here used by the testator, it is clear that the brothers and sisters only could take, and not the brothers' and sisters' children, thus restricting the word "heir" to its natural and appropriate signification, from which it can be converted into a word of purchase only by the clear and controlling intent of the testator. This *construction is further supported by those words which require a distribution of the proceeds of the real estate equally, share and share alike, to the legatees; a distribution which could not take place per stirpes, or in the event of one or more brothers surviving, and the death of the rest, leaving issue living at the death of the son.

On this point, therefore, I concur with the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; and only regret that I cannot concur both with that court and this on the other bequest.

Upon the question so solemnly pressed upon this court in the argument, how far the decision of the court of Pennsylvania ought to have been considered as obligatory on this court, I would be understood as entertaining the following views: As precedents entitled to high respect, the decisions of the state courts will always be considered; and in all cases of local law, we acknowledge an established and uniform course of decisions of the state courts, in the respective states, as the law of this court; that is to say, that such decisions will be as obligatory upon this court as they would be acknowledged to be in their own courts. But a single decision on the construction of a will cannot be acknowledged as of binding efficacy, however it may be respected as a precedent. In the present instance, I feel myself sustained in my opinion upon the legacy to A. Young, by the opinion of one of the three learned judges who composed the state court.

JOHNSON AND GRAHAM'S LESSEE

WILLIAM M'INTOSH.

A title to lands, under grants to private individuals, made by Indian tribes or nations north-west of the river Ohio, in 1773, and 1775, cannot be recognized in the courts of the United States.

uals, made by Indian tribes or nations north-west of the river Ohio, in 1773, and 1775, cannot be recognized in the courts of the United States.

ERROR to the District Court of Illinois.

This was an action of ejectment for lands in the state and district of Illinois, claimed by the plaintiffs under a purchase and conveyance from the Piankeshaw Indians, and by the defendant, under a grant from the United States. It came up on a case stated, upon which there was a judgment below for the defendant. The case stated set out the following facts:

1st. That on the 23d of May, 1609, James I., King of England, by his letters patent of that date, under the great seal of England, did erect, form, and establish Robert, Earl of Salisbury, and others, his associates, in the letters patent named, and their successors, into a body corporate and politic, by the name and style of "The Treasurer and Company of Adventurers and Planters of the City of London, for the first Colony in Virginia," with perpetual succession, and power to make, have, and use a common seal; and did give, grant, and confirm unto this company, and their successors, *under certain reservations and limitations in the letters patent expressed, [*544 "All the lands, countries and territories, situate, lying and being in that part of North America called Virginia, from the point of land called Cape or Point Comfort, all along the sea-coast to the northward two hundred miles; and from the said Cape or Point Comfort, all along the sea-coast to the southward, two hundred miles; and all that space and circuit of land lying from the sea-coast of the precinct aforesaid, up into the land throughout from the sea, west and north-west; and also all the islands lying within one hundred miles, along the coast of both seas of the precinct aforesaid; with all the soil, grounds, rights, privileges, and appurtenances to these territories belonging, and in the letters patent particularly enumerated;" and did grant to this corporation, and their successors, various powers of government, in the letters patent particularly expressed.

2d. That the place called in these letters patent Cape or Point Comfort, is the place now called and known by the name of Old Point Comfort, on the Chesapeake Bay and Hampton Roads; and that immediately after the granting of the letters patent, the corporation proceeded, under and by virtue of them, to take possession of parts of the territory which they describe, and to form settlements, plant a colony, and exercise the powers of government therein; which colony was called and known by the name of the colony of Virginia.

3d. That at the time of granting these letters patent, and of the discovery of the continent of *North America by the Europeans, and [*545 during the whole intermediate time, the whole of the territory, in the letters patent described, except a small district on James River, where a settlement of Europeans had previously been made, was held, occupied and possessed, in full sovereignty, by various independent tribes or nations of Indians, who were the sovereigns of their respective portions of the territory, and the absolute owners and proprietors of the soil; and who neither acknowledged nor owed any allegiance or obedience to any European sovereign or state whatever; and that in making settlements within this territory, and in all the other parts of North America, where settlements were made, under the authority of the English government, or by its subjects, the right of soil was previously obtained by purchase or conquest, from the particular Indian tribe or nation by which the soil was claimed and held; or the consent of such tribe or nation was secured.

4th. That in the year 1624, this corporation was dissolved by due course of law, and all its powers, together with its rights of soil and jurisdiction, under the letters patent in question, were revested in the crown of England; whereupon the colony became a royal government, with the same territorial limits and extent which had been established by the letters patent, and so continued until it became a free and independent state; except so far as its limits and extent were altered and curtailed by the treaty of February 10th, 1763, between Great Britain and France, and by the letters patent granted by the King of England for 546*] *establishing the colonies of Carolina, Maryland, and Pennsylvania.

5th. That some time previous to the year 1756, the French government, laying a claim to the country west of the Alleghany or Appalachian Mountains, on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and their branches, took possession of certain parts of it, with the consent of the several tribes or nations of Indians possessing and owning them; and, with the like consent, established several military posts and settlements therein, particularly at Kaskaskias, on the river Kaskaskias, and at Vincennes, on the river Wabash, within the limits of the colony of Virginia, as described and established in and by the letters patent of May 23d, 1609; and that the government of Great Britain, after complaining of these establishments as encroachments, and remonstrating against them, at length, in the year 1756, took up arms to resist and repel them, which produced a war between those two nations, wherein the Indian tribes inhabiting and holding the countries north-west of the Ohio, and on the Mississippi above the mouth of the Ohio, were the allies of France, and the Indians known by the name of the Six Nations, or the Iroquois, and their tributaries and allies, were the allies of Great Britain; and that on the 10th of February, 1763, this war was terminated by a definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and France, and their allies, by which it was stipulated and agreed, that the river Mississippi, from its source to the Iberville, should forever after form the boundary between the dominions 547*] of *Great Britain and those of France, in that part of North America, and between their respective allies there.

6th. That the government of Virginia, at and before the commencement of this war, and at all times after it became a royal government, claimed and exercised jurisdiction, with the knowledge and assent of the government of Great Britain, in and over the country north-west of the river Ohio, and east of the Mississippi, as being included within the bounds and limits described and established for that colony, by the letters patent of May 23d, 1609; and that in the year 1749 a grant of six hundred thousand acres of land, within the country north-west of the Ohio, and as part of Virginia, was made by the government of Great Britain to some of its subjects, by the name and style of the Ohio Company.

7th. That at and before the commencement of the war in 1756, and during its whole continuance, and at the time of the treaty of February 10th, 1763, the Indian tribes or nations, inhabiting the country north and north-west of the Ohio, and east of the Mississippi, as far east as the river falling into the Ohio called the Great Miami, were called and known by the name of the Western Confederacy of Indians, and were the allies of France in the war, but not her subjects, never having been in any manner conquered by her, and held the country in absolute sovereignty, as independent nations, both as to the right of jurisdiction and sovereignty, and the right of soil, except a few military posts, and a small territory around each, *which they had ceded to France, [548 and she held under them, and among which were the aforesaid posts of Kaskaskias and Vincennes; and that these Indians, after the treaty became the allies of Great Britain, living under her protection as they had before lived under that of France, but were free and independent, owing no allegiance to any foreign power whatever, and holding their lands in absolute property; the territories of the respective tribes being separated from each other, and distinguished by certain natural marks and boundaries to the Indians well known; and each tribe claiming and exercising separate and absolute ownership, in and over its own territory, both as to the right of sovereignty and jurisdiction, and the right of soil.

8th. That among the tribes of Indians thus holding and inhabiting the territory north and north-west of the Ohio, east of the Mississippi, and west of the Great Miami, within the limits of Virginia, as described in the letters patent of May 23d, 1609, were certain independent tribes or nations, called the Illinois or Kaskaskias, and the Piankeshaw or Wabash Indians; the first of which consisted of three several tribes united into one, and called the Kaskaskias, the Pewarias, and the Cahokia; that the Illinois owned, held and inhabited, as their absolute and separate property, a large tract of country within the last-mentioned limits, and situated on the Mississippi, Illinois, and Kaskaskias rivers, and on the Ohio below the mouth of the Wabash; and the Piankeshaws, another large tract of country within the same *limits, and as their absolute and sep- [549 arate property, on the Wabash and Ohio rivers; and that these Indians remained in the sole and absolute ownership and possession of the country in question, until the sales made by them in the manner hereinafter set forth.

9th. That on the termination of the war between Great Britain and France, the Illinois Indians, by the name of the Kaskaskias tribes of Indians, as fully representing all the Illinois tribes then remaining, made a treaty of peace with Great Britain, and a treaty of peace, limits and amity, under her mediation, with the Six Nations, or Iroquois, and their allies, then known and distinguished by the name of the Northern Confederacy of Indians; the Illinois being a part of the confederacy then known and distinguished by the name of the Southern Confederacy, and sometimes by that of the Western Confederacy.

10th. That on the 7th of October, 1763, the King of Great Britain made and published a proclamation for the better regulation of the countries ceded to Great Britain by that treaty, which proclamation is referred to and made part of the ease.

11th. That from time immemorial, and always up to the present time, all the Indian tribes, or nations of North America, and especially the Illinois and Piankeshaws, and other tribes holding, possessing and inhabiting the said countries north and north-east of the Ohio, east of the Mississippi, and west of the Great Miami, held their respective lands and territories each in common, the individuals 550 *] of each tribe or nation holding the lands and territories of such tribe in common with each other, and there being among them no separate property in the soil; and that there sole method of selling, granting and conveying their lands, whether to governments or individuals, always has been, from time immemorial, and now is, for certain chiefs of the tribe selling, to represent the whole tribe in every part of the transaction; to make the contract and execute the deed on behalf of the whole tribe; to receive for it the consideration, whether in money or commodities, or both; and, finally, to divide such consideration among the individuals of the tribe; and that the authority of the chiefs, so acting for the whole tribe, is attested by the presence and assent of the individuals composing the tribe, or some of them, and by the receipt by the individuals composing the tribe, of their respective shares of the price, and in no other manner.

12th. That on the 5th of July, 1773, certain chiefs of the Illinois Indians, then jointly representing, acting for and being duly authorized by that tribe, in the manner explained above, did, by their deed poll, duly executed and delivered, and bearing date on that day, at the post of Kaskaskias, then being a British military post, and at a public council there held by them, for and on behalf of the said Illinois nation of Indians, with William Murray, of the Illinois country, merchant, acting for himself and for Moses Franks and Jacob Franks, of London, in Great Britain, David Franks, John Inglis, Bernard Gratz, Michael Gratz, 551 *] Alexander Ross, David Sproat and James Milligan, all of Philadelphia, in the province of Pennsylvania; Moses Franks, Andrew Hamilton, William Hamilton and Edmund Milne, of the same place; Joseph Simons, otherwise called Joseph Simon, and Levi Andrew Levi, of the town of Lancaster, in Pennsylvania; Thomas Minshall, of York county, in the same province; Robert Callender and William Thompson, of Cumberland county, in the same province; John Campbell, of Pittsburgh, in the same province; and George Castles and James Ramsay, of the Illinois country; and for a good and valuable consideration in the said deed stated, grant, bargain, sell, alien, lease, enfeoff and confirm to the said William Murray, Moses Franks, Jacob Franks, David Franks, John Inglis, Bernard Gratz, Michael Gratz, Alexander Ross, David Sproat, James

Milligan, Andrew Hamilton, William Hamilton, Edmund Milne, Joseph Simons, otherwise called Joseph Simon, Levi Andrew Levi, Thomas Minshall, Robert Callender, William Thompson, John Campbell, George Castles and James Ramsay, their heirs and assigns forever, in severalty, or to George III., then King of Great Britain and Ireland, his heirs and successors, for the use, benefit and behoof of the grantees, their heirs and assigns, in severalty, by whichever of those tenures they might most legally hold, all those two several tracts or parcels of land, situated, lying and being within the limits of Virginia, on the east of the Mississippi, north-west of the Ohio, and west of the Great Miami, and this butted *and bounded: Begin- [552 ning for one of the said tracts on the east side of the Mississippi, at the mouth of the Heron Creek, called by the French the river of Mary, being about a league below the mouth of the Kaskaskias River, and running thence a northward of east course, in a direct line, back to the Hilly Plains, about eight leagues more or less; thence the same course, in a direct line to the Crab Tree Plains, about seventeen leagues more or less; thence the same course, in a direct line, to a remarkable place known by the name of the Big Buffalo Hoofs, about seventeen leagues more or less; thence the same course, in a direct line to the Salt Lick Creek, about seven leagues more or less; then crossing the Salt Lick Creek, about one league below the ancient Shawanese town, in an easterly, or a little to the north of east, course, in a direct line to the river Ohio, about four leagues more or less; then down the Ohio, by its several courses, until it empties into the Mississippi, about thirty-five leagues more or less; and then up the Mississippi, by its several courses, to the place of beginning, about thirty-three leagues more or less. And beginning for the other tract on the Mississippi, at a point directly opposite to the mouth of the Missouri, and running up the Mississippi, by its several courses, to the mouth of the Illinois, about six leagues more or less; and thence up the Illinois, by its several courses, to Chieagou or Garlie Creek, about ninety leagues, more or less; thence nearly a northerly course, in a direct line, to a certain remarkable place, being the ground on which a *battle was fought, about forty or fifty [553 years before that time, between the Pewaria and Renard Indians, about fifty leagues more or less; thence by the same course, in a direct line, to two remarkable hills close together, in the middle of a large prairie or plain, about fourteen leagues more or less; thence in a north of east course, in a direct line, to a remarkable spring, known by the Indians by the name of "Foggy Spring," about fourteen leagues more or less; thence the same course, in a direct line to a great mountain, to the north-west of the White Buffalo Plain, about fifteen leagues more or less; and thence nearly a south-west course to the place of beginning, about forty leagues more or less. To have and to hold the said two tracts of land, with all and singular their appurtenances, to the grantees, their heirs and assigns, forever, in severalty, or to the King, his heirs and successors, to and for the use, benefit or behoof of the grantees, their heirs and assigns, forever, in severalty; as will more fully appear by the said deed poll, duly executed under the hands and seals of the grantors, and duly recorded at Kaskaskias, on the 2d of September, 1773, in the office of Vicerault Lemerand, a notary public duly appointed and authorized. This deed, with the several certificates annexed to or indorsed on it, was set out at length in the case.

13th. That the consideration in this deed expressed, was of the value of $24,000, current money of the United States, and upwards, and was paid and delivered, at the time of the execution of the deed, by William Murray, one 554 *] of the grantees, in behalf of himself and the other grantees, to the Illinois Indians, who freely accepted it, and divided it among themselves; that the conferences in which the sale of these lands was agreed on and made, and in which it was agreed that the deed should be executed, were publicly held, for the space of a month, at the post of Kaskaskias, and were attended by many individuals of all the tribes of Illinois Indians, besides the chiefs named as grantors in the deed; that the whole transaction was open, public and fair, and the deed fully explained to the grantors and other Indians by the sworn interpreters of the government, and fully understood by the grantors and other Indians, before it was executed; that the several witnesses to the deed, and the grantees named in it, were such persons, and of such quality and stations, respectively, as they are described to be in the deed, the attestation, and the other indorsements on it; that the grantees did duly authorize William Murray to act for and represent them, in the purchase of the lands, and the acceptance of the deed; and that the two tracts or parcels of land to which it describes, and purports to grant, were then part of the lands held, possessed and inhabited by the Illinois Indians, from time immemorial, in the manner already stated.

14th. That all the persons named as grantees in this deed, were, at the time of its execution, and long before, subjects of the crown of Great Britain, and residents of the several places named in the deed as their places of residence; 555 *] and that *they entered into the land, under and by virtue of the deed, and became seized as the law requires.

15th. That on the 18th of October, 1775, Tabac, and certain other Indians, all being chiefs of the Piankeshaws, and jointly representing, acting for and duly authorized by that nation, in the manner stated above, did, by their deed poll, duly executed, and bearing date on the day last mentioned, at the post of Vincennes, otherwise called Post St. Vincent, then being a British military post, and at a public council there held by them, for and on behalf of the Piankeshaw Indians, with Louis Viviat, of the Illinois country, acting for himself, and for the Right Honorable John, Earl of Dunmore, then Governor of Virginia; the Honorable John Murray, son of the said earl; Moses Franks and Jacob Franks, of London, in Great Britain; Thomas Johnson, Jr., and John Davidson, both of Annapolis, in Maryland; William Russel, Matthew Ridley, Robert Christie, Sr., and Robert Christie, Jr., of Baltimore town, in the same province; Peter Campbell, of Piscataway, in the same province; William Geddes, of Newtown Chester, in the same province, collector of His Majesty's customs; David Franks and Moses Franks, both of Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania; William Murray and Daniel Murray, of the Illinois country; Nicholas St. Martin and Joseph Page, of the same place; Francis Perthuis, late of Quebec, in Canada, but then of Post St. Vincent, and for good and valuable considerations, in the deed poll mentioned and enumerated, grant, bargain, sell, alien, enfeoff, release, ratify and *confirm to the said [556 Louis Viviat, and the other persons last mentioned, their heirs and assigns, equally to be divided, or to George III., then King of Great Britain and Ireland, his heirs and successors, for the use, benefit and behoof of all the above-mentioned grantees, their heirs and assigns, in severalty, by whichever of those tenures they might most legally hold, all those two several tracts of land in the deed particularly described, situate, lying and being north-west of the Ohio, east of the Mississippi, and west of the Great Miami, within the limits of Virginia, and on both sides of the Ouabache, otherwise called the Wabash; which two tracts of land are contained respectively within the following metes and bounds, courses and distances, that is to say: Beginning for one of the said tracts at the mouth of a rivulet called Riviere du Chat, or Cat River, where it empties itself into the Ouabache or Wabash, by its several courses, to a place called Point Coupee, about twelve leagues above Post St. Vincent, being forty leagues, or thereabouts, in length, on the said river Ouabache, from the place of beginning, with forty leagues in width or breadth on the east side, and thirty leagues in width or breadth on the west side of that river, to be continued along from the place of beginning to Point Coupee. And beginning for the other tract at the mouth of White River, where it empties into the Ouabache, about twelve leagues below Post St. Vincent, and running thence down the Ouabache, by its several courses, until it empties into the Ohio; being from White River to the Ohio about fifty-three leagues in length more or less, with forty *leagues [557 in width or breadth on the east side, and thirty in width or breadth on the west side of the Ouabache, to be continued along from the White River to the Ohio; with all the rights, liberties, privileges, hereditaments and appurtenances to the said tract belonging; to have and to hold to the grantees, their heirs and assigns forever, in severalty, or to the King, his heirs and successors, for the use, benefit and behoof of the grantees, their heirs and assigns, as will more fully appear by the deed itself, duly executed under the hands and seals of the grantors, and duly recorded at Kaskaskias, on the 5th of December, 1775, in the office of Louis Bomer, a notary public duly appointed and authorized. This deed, with the several certificates annexed to or indorsed on it, was set out at length.

16th. That the consideration in this deed expressed was of the value of $31,000, current money of the United States, and upwards, and was paid and delivered at the time of the execution of the deed, by the grantee, Lewis Viviat, in behalf of himself and the other grantees, to the Piankeshaw Indians, who freely accepted it, and divided it among themselves; that the conferences in which the sale of these two tracts of land was agreed on and made, and in which it was agreed that the deed should be executed, were publicly held for the space of a month, at the post of Vincennes, or Post St. Vincent, and were attested by many individuals of the Piankeshaw nation of Indians, besides the chiefs named as grantors in the deed; 558* that the whole *transaction was open, public and fair, and the deed fully explained to the grantors and other Indians by skillful interpreters, and fully understood by them before it was executed; that it was executed in the presence of the several witnesses by whom it purports to have been attested, and was attested by them; that the grantees were all subjects of the crown of Great Britain, and were of such quality, station and residence, respectively, as they are described in the deed to be; that the grantees did duly authorize Lewis Viviat to act for and represent them in the purchase of these two tracts of land, and in the acceptance of the deed; that these tracts of land were then part of the lands held, possessed and inhabited by the Piankeshaw Indians, from time immemorial, as is stated above; and that the several grantees under this deed entered into the land which it purports to grant, and became seized as the law requires.

17th. That on the 6th of May, 1776, the colony of Virginia threw off its dependence on the crown and government of Great Britain, and declared itself an independent state and government, with the limits prescribed and established by the letters patent of May 23d, 1609, as curtailed and restricted by the letters patent establishing the colonies of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Carolina, and by the treaty of February 10th, 1763, between Great Britain and France; which limits, so curtailed and restricted, the state of Virginia, by its constitution and form of government, declared should be and remain the limits of the state, and should bound its western and north-western extent.

559* 18th. That on the 5th of October, 1778, the general assembly of Virginia, having taken by arms the posts of Kaskaskias and Vincennes, or St. Vincent, from the British forces, by whom they were then held, and driven those forces from the country north-west of the Ohio, east of the Mississippi, and west of the Great Miami, did, by an act of assembly of that date, entitled, "An act for establishing the county of Illinois, and for the more effectual protection and defense thereof," erect that country, with certain other portions of territory within the limits of the state, and north-west of the Ohio, into a county, by the name of the county of Illinois.

19th. That on the 20th of December, 1783, the state of Virginia, by an act of assembly of that date, authorized their delegates in the Congress of the United States, or such of them, to the number of three at least, as should be assembled in Congress, on behalf of the state, and by proper deeds or instruments in writing under their hands and seals, to convey, transfer, assign and make over to the United States, in Congress assembled, for the benefit of the said states, all right, title and claim, as well of soil as jurisdiction, which Virginia had to the territory or tract of country within her limits, as defined and prescribed by the letters patent of May, 23d, 1609, and lying to the north-west of the Wheat. 8.

Ohio; subject to certain limitations and conditions in the act prescribed and specified; and that on the 1st of March, 1784, Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Hardy, Arthur Lee and James Monroe, then being four of the delegates *of Virginia, to the Congress of the [*560 United States, did, by their deed poll, under their hands and seals, in pursuance and execution of the authority to them given by this act of assembly, convey, transfer, assign and make over to the United States, in Congress assembled for the benefit of the said states, all right, title and claim, as well of soil as jurisdiction, which that state had to the territory north-west of the Ohio, with the reservations, limitations, and conditions, in the act of assembly prescribed; which cession the United States accepted.

20th. That on the twentieth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, the United States, by their officers duly authorized for that purpose, did sell, grant and convey to the defendant in this action, William M'Intosh, all those several tracts or parcels of land, containing 11,560 acres, and butted, bounded and described as will fully appear in and by the patent for the said lands, duly executed, which was set out at length.

21st. That the lands described and granted in and by this patent are situated within the state of Illinois, and are contained within the lines of the last, or second of the two tracts, described and purporting to be granted and conveyed to Louis Viviat and others, by the deed of October 18th, 1775; and that William M'Intosh, the defendant, entered upon these lands under and by virtue of his patent, and became possessed thereof before the institution of this suit.

22d. That Thomas Johnson, one of the grantees, *in and under the deed of [*561 October 18th, 1775, departed this life on or about the first day of October, 1819, seized of all his undivided part or share of and in the two several tracts of land, described and purporting to be granted and conveyed to him and others by that deed, having first duly made and published his last will and testament in writing, attested by three credible witnesses, which he left in full force, and by which he devised all his undivided share and part of those two tracts of land to his son, Joshua Johnson, and his heirs, and his grandson, Thomas J. Graham, and his heirs, the lessors of the plaintiff in this action, as tenants in common.

23d. That Joshua Johnson and Thomas J. Graham, and devisees, entered into the two tracts of land last above mentioned, under and by virtue of the will, and became thereof seized as the law requires. That Thomas Johnson, the grantee and deviser, during his whole life, and at the time of his death, was an inhabitant and citizen of the state of Maryland; that Joshua Johnson and Thomas J. Graham, the lessors of the plaintiff, now are, and always have been, citizens of the same state; that the defendant, William M'Intosh, now is, and at and before the time of bringing this action was, a citizen of the state of Illinois; and that the matter in dispute in this action is of the value of $2,000, current money of the United States, and upwards.

24th. And that neither William Murray, nor any other of the grantees under the deed of July the 5th, 1773, nor Louis Viviat, nor any other 562*] of the *grantees under the deed of October the 8th, 1775, nor any person for them, or any of them, ever obtained, or had the actual possession, under and by virtue of those deeds, or either of them, of any part of the lands in them, or either of them, described and purporting to be granted; but were prevented by the war of the American revolution, which soon after commenced, and by the disputes and troubles which preceded it, from obtaining such possession; and that since the termination of the war, and before it, they have repeatedly, and at various times, from the year 1781 till the year 1816, petitioned the Congress of the United States to acknowledge and confirm their title to those lands, under the purchases and deeds in question, but without success.

Judgment being given for the defendant on the case stated, the plaintiffs brought this writ of error.

The cause was argued by Mr. Harper and Mr. Webster for the plaintiffs, and by Mr. Win-der and Mr. Murray for the defendants. But as the arguments are so fully stated in the opinion of the court, it is deemed unnecessary to give anything more than the following summary:

On the part of the plaintiffs it was contended, 1. That upon the facts stated in the case, the Piankeshaw Indians were the owners of the lands in dispute, at the time of executing the deed of October 10th, 1775, and had power to sell. But as the United States had purchased the same lands of the same Indians, both parties claim from the same source. It would seem, therefore, to be unnecessary, and merely specu-563*] lative, to discuss *the question respecting the sort of title or ownership which may be thought to belong to savage tribes, in the lands on which they live. Probably, however, their title by occupancy is to be respected, as much as that of an individual, obtained by the same right, in a civilized state. The circumstance that the members of the society held in common, did not affect the strength of their title by occupancy.<sup>1</sup> In the memorial, or manifesto, of the British government, in 1755, a right of soil in the Indians is admitted. It is also admitted in the treaties of Utrecht and Aix la Chapelle. The same opinion has been expressed by this court,<sup>2</sup> and by the Supreme Court of New York.<sup>3</sup> In short, all, or nearly all, the lands in the United States is holden under purchases from the Indian nations; and the only question in this case must be, whether it be competent to individuals to make such purchases, or whether that be the exclusive prerogative of government.

2. That the British King's proclamation of October 7th, 1763, could not affect this right of the Indians to sell, because they were not British subjects, nor in any manner bound by the authority of the British government, legislative or executive. And, because, even admitting them to be British subjects, absolutely, or sub modo, they were still proprietors of the soil, and could not be divested of their rights of property, or any of its *incidents, by a mere act of [*564 the executive government, such as this proclamation.

3. That the proclamation of 1763 could not restrain the purchasers under these deeds from purchasing; because the lands lay within the limits of the colony of Virginia, of which, or of some other British colony, the purchasers, all being British subjects, were inhabitants. And because the king had not, within the limits of that colonial government, or any other, any power of prerogative legislation, which is confined to countries newly conquered, and remaining in the military possession of the monarch, as supreme chief of the military forces of the nation. The present claim has long been known to the government of the United States, and is mentioned in the collection land laws, published under public authority. The compiler of those laws supposes this title void, by virtue of the proclamation of 1763. But we have the positive authority of a solemn determination of the Court of King's Bench, on this very proclamation, in the celebrated Grenada case, for asserting that it could have no such effect.<sup>4</sup> This country being a new conquest, and a military possession, the crown might exercise legislative powers, until a local legislature was established. But the establishment of a government establishes a system of laws, and excludes the power of legislating by proclamation. The proclamation could not have the force of law within the chartered limits of Virginia. A proclamation *that no person [*565 should purchase land in England or Canada, would be clearly void.

4. That the act of assembly of Virginia, passed in May, 1779,<sup>5</sup> cannot affect the right of the plaintiffs, and others claiming under these deeds; because on general principles, and by the constitution of Virginia, the legislature was not competent to take away private, vested except only persons duly authorized to make such purchases on the public account, formerly for the use and benefit of the colony, and lately of the commonwealth; and that such exclusive right or pre-emption, will and ought to be maintained by this commonwealth, to the utmost of its power.

5.—This statute is as follows: "An act for declaring and asserting the rights of this commonwealth, concerning purchasing lands from Indian natives. To remove and prevent all doubt concerning purchases of lands from the Indian natives, Be it declared by the general assembly, that this commonwealth hath the exclusive right of pre-emption from the Indians, of all the lands within the limits of its own chartered territory, as described by the act and constitution of government, in the year 1776. That no person or persons whatsoever, have, or ever had, a right to purchase any lands within the same, from any Indian nation,

"And be it further declared and enacted, That every purchase of lands heretofore made, by, or on behalf of, the crown of England or Great Britain, from any Indian nation or nations, within the before-mentioned limits, doth and ought to enure forever, to and for the use and benefit of this commonwealth, and to or for no other use or purpose whatsoever; and that all sales and deeds which have been, or shall be made by any Indian or Indians, or by any Indian nation or nations, for lands within the said limits, to or for the separate use of any person or persons whatsoever, shall be, and the same, are hereby declared utterly void and of no effect."

rights, or appropriate private property to public use under the circumstances of this case. 566*] And because the act is not *contained in the revival of 1794, and must, therefore, be considered as repealed; and the repeal re-instates all rights that might have been affected by the act, although the territory, in which the lands in question lie, was ceded to the United States before the repeal. The act of 1779 was passed after the sales were made, and it cannot affect titles previously obtained. At the time of the purchases there was no law of Virginia rendering such purchases void. If, therefore, the purchases were not affected by the proclamation of 1763, nor by the act of 1779, the question of their validity comes to the general inquiry, whether individuals, in Virginia, at the time of this purchase, could legally obtain Indian titles. In New England, titles have certainly been obtained in this mode. But whatever may be said on the more general question, and in reference to other colonies or states, the fact being that in Virginia there was no statute existing at the time against such purchases, mere general considerations would not apply. It may be true that, in almost all the colonies, individual purchases from the Indians were illegal; but they were rendered so by express provisions of the local law. In Virginia, also, it may be true that such purchases have generally been prohibited; but at the time the purchases now in question were made, there was no prohibitory law in existence. The old colonial laws on the subject had all been repealed. The act of 1779 was a private act, so far as respects this case. It is the same as if it had enacted that these particular deeds 567*] were void. Such acts *bind only those who are parties to them, who submit their case to the legislature.

On the part of the defendants, it was insisted that the uniform understanding and practice of European nations, and the settled law, as laid down by the tribunals of civilized states, denied the right of the Indians to be considered as independent communities, having a permanent property in the soil, capable of alienation to private individuals. They remain in a state of nature, and have never been admitted into the general society of nations.<sup>1</sup> All the treaties and negotiations between the civilized powers of Europe and of this continent, from the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, to that of Ghent, in 1814, have uniformly disregarded their supposed right to the territory included within the jurisdictional limits of those powers.<sup>2</sup> Not only has the practice of all civilized nations been in conformity with this doctrine, but the whole theory of their titles to lands in America rests upon the hypothesis that the Indians had no right of soil as sovereign, independent states. Discovery is the foundation of title, in European nations, and this overlooks all proprietary rights in the natives.<sup>3</sup> The sovereignty and *eminent domain thus acquired, necessarily precludes the idea of any other sovereignty existing within the same limits. The subjects of the discovering nation must necessarily be bound by the declared sense of their own government, as to the extent of this sovereignty and the domain acquired with it. Even if it should be admitted that the Indians were originally an independent people, they have ceased to be so. A nation that has passed under the dominion of another is no longer a sovereign state.<sup>4</sup> The same treaties and negotiations, before referred to, show their dependent condition. Or, if it be admitted that they are now independent and foreign states, the title of the plaintiffs would still be invalid; as grantees from the Indians, they must take according to their laws of property, and as Indian subjects. The law of every dominion affects all persons and property situate within it;<sup>5</sup> and the Indians never had any idea of individual property in lands. It cannot be said that the lands conveyed were disjoined from their dominion, because the grantees could not take the sovereignty and eminent domain to themselves.

Such, then, being the nature of the Indian title to lands, the extent of their right of alienation must depend upon the laws of the dominion under which they live. They are subject to the sovereignty of the United States. The subjection proceeds from their residence within our territory *and jurisdiction. It is [*569 unnecessary to show that they are not citizens in the ordinary sense of that term, since they are destitute of the most essential rights which belong to that character. They are of that class who are said by jurists not to be citizens, but perpetual inhabitants with diminutive rights.<sup>6</sup> The statutes of Virginia, and of all the other colonies, and of the United States, treat them as an inferior race of people, without the privileges of citizens, and under the perpetual protection and pupillage of the government. The act of Virginia of 1662, forbade purchases from the Indians, and it does not appear that it was ever repealed. The act of 1779 is rather to be regarded as a declaratory act, founded upon what had always been regarded as the settled law. These statutes seem to define sufficiently the nature of the Indian title to lands; a mere right of usufruct and habitation, without power of alienation. By the law of nature, they had not acquired a fixed property capable of being transferred. The measure of property acquired by occupancy is determined, according to the law of nature, by the extent of men's wants, and their capacity of using it to supply them.<sup>7</sup> It is a violation of the rights of others to exclude them from the use of what we do not want, and they have an occasion for. Upon this principle the North American Indians could have acquired no proprietary interest in the vast tracts of *territory which they wandered over; [*570 and their right to the lands on which they hunted could not be considered as superior to that which is acquired to the sea by fishing in it. The use in the one case, as well as the other, is not exclusive.<sup>1</sup> According to every theory of property, the Indians had no individual rights to land; nor had they any collectively, or in their national capacity; for the lands occupied by each tribe were not used by them in such a manner as to prevent their being appropriated by a people of cultivators. All the proprietary rights of civilized nations on this continent are founded on this principle. The right derived from discovery and conquest can rest on no other basis; and all existing titles depend on the fundamental title of the crown by discovery. The title of the crown (as representing the nation) passed to the colonists by charters, which were absolute grants of the soil; and it was a first principle in colonial law that all titles must be derived from the crown. It is true that, in some cases, purchases were made by the colonies from the Indians; but this was merely a measure of policy to prevent hostilities; and William Penn's purchase, which was the most remarkable transaction of this kind, was not deemed to add to the strength of his title.<sup>2</sup> In [*571*] most of the colonies the *doctrine was received that all titles to land must be derived exclusively from the crown, upon the principle that the settlers carried with them, not only all the rights, but all the duties of Englishmen; and particularly the laws of property, so far as they are suitable to their new condition.<sup>3</sup> In New England alone, some lands have been held under Indian deeds. But this was an anomaly arising from peculiar local and political causes.<sup>4</sup>

As to the effect of the proclamation of 1763: If the Indians are to be regarded as independent sovereign states, then, by the treaty of peace, they became subject to the prerogative legislation of the crown, as a conquered people, in a territory acquired, jure belli, and ceded at the peace.<sup>5</sup> If, on the contrary, this country be regarded as a royal colony, then the crown had a direct power of legislation; or at least the power of prescribing the limits within which grants of land and settlements should be made within the colony. The same practice always prevailed under the proprietary governments, and has been followed by the government of the United States.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in this cause claim the land, in their declaration mentioned, under two grants, purporting to be made, the first in 1773, and the [*572*] last in 1775, by the chiefs of certain *Indian tribes, constituting the Illinois and the Piankeshaw nations; and the question is, whether this title can be recognized in the courts of the United States?

The facts as stated in the case agreed, show the authority of the chiefs who executed this conveyance, so far as it could be given by their own people; and likewise show that the particular tribes for whom these chiefs acted were in rightful possession of the land they sold. The inquiry, therefore, is, in a great measure, confined to the power of Indians to give, and of private individuals to receive, a title which can be sustained in the courts of this country.

As the right of society to prescribe those rules by which property may be acquired and preserved is not, and cannot be drawn into question; as the title to lands, especially, is and must be admitted to depend entirely on the law of the nation in which they lie; it will be necessary, in pursuing this inquiry, to examine, not singly those principles of abstract justice, which the Creator of all things has impressed on the mind of his creature man, and which are admitted to regulate, in a great degree, the rights of civilized nations, whose perfect independence is acknowledged; but those principles also which our own government has adopted in the particular case, and given us as the rule for our decision.

On the discovery of this immense continent, the great nations of Europe were eager to appropriate to themselves so much of it as they could respectively acquire. Its vast extent offered an ample field to the ambition [*573] and enterprise of all; and the character and religion of its inhabitants afforded an apology for considering them as a people over whom the superior genius of Europe might claim an ascendancy. The potentates of the old world found no difficulty in convincing themselves that they made ample compensation to the inhabitants of the new, by bestowing on them civilization and Christianity, in exchange for unlimited independence. But, as they were all in pursuit of nearly the same object, it was necessary, in order to avoid conflicting settlements, and consequent war with each other, to establish a principle which all should acknowledge as the law by which the right of acquisition, which they all asserted, should be regulated as between themselves. This principle was that discovery gave title to the government by whose subjects, or by whose authority, it was made, against all other European governments, which title might be consummated by possession.

The exclusion of all other Europeans, necessarily gave to the nation making the discovery the sole right of acquiring the soil from the natives, and establishing settlements upon it. It was a right with which no Europeans could interfere. It was a right which all asserted for themselves, and to the assertion of which, by others, all assented.

Those relations which were to exist between the discoverer and the natives, were to be regulated by themselves. The rights thus acquired being exclusive, no other power could interpose between them.

*In the establishment of these rela- [*574] tions, the rights of the original inhabitants were, in no instance, entirely disregarded; but were necessarily, to a considerable extent, impaired. They were admitted to be the rightful occupants of the soil, with a legal as well as just claim to retain possession of it, and to use it according to their own discretion; but their rights to complete sovereignty, as independent nations, were necessarily diminished, and their power to dispose of the soil at their own will, to whomsoever they pleased, was denied by the original fundamental principle that discovery gave exclusive title to those who made it.

While the different nations of Europe respected the right of the natives, as occupants, they asserted the ultimate dominion to be in themselves; and claimed and exercised, as a consequence of this ultimate dominion, a power to grant the soil, while yet in possession of the natives. These grants have been understood by all to convey a title to the grantees, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy.

The history of America, from its discovery to the present day, proves, we think, the universal recognition of these principles.

Spain did not rest her title solely on the grant of the Pope. Her discussions respecting boundary, with France, with Great Britain, and with the United States, all show that she placed it on the rights given by discovery. Portugal sustained her claim to the Brazils by the same title.

France, also, founded her title to the vast territories she claimed in America on discovery. <sup>[575*]</sup> However *conciliatory her conduct to the natives may have been, she still asserted her right of dominion over a great extent of country not actually settled by Frenchmen, and her exclusive right to acquire and dispose of the soil which remained in the occupation of Indians. Her monarch claimed all Canada and Acadie, as colonies of France, at a time when the French population was very inconsiderable, and the Indians occupied almost the whole country. He also claimed Louisiana, comprehending the immense territories watered by the Mississippi, and the rivers which empty into it, by the title of discovery. The letters patent granted to the Sieur Demonts, in 1603, constitute him Lieutenant-General, and the representative of the King in Acadie, which is described as stretching from the fortieth to the forty-sixth degree of north latitude; with authority to extend the power of the French over that country, and its inhabitants; to give laws to the people; to treat with the natives, and enforce the observance of treaties, and to parcel out and give title to lands, according to his own judgment.

The states of Holland also made acquisitions in America, and sustained their right on the common principle adopted by all Europe. They allege, as we are told by Smith, in his History of New York, that Henry Hudson, who sailed, as they say, under the orders of their East India Company, discovered the country from the Delaware to the Hudson, up which he sailed to the forty-third degree of north latitude; and this country they claimed under the title acquired by this voyage. Their <sup>[576*]</sup> *first object was commercial, as appears by a grant made to a company of merchants in 1614; but in 1621, the States-General made, as we are told by Mr. Smith, a grant of the country to the West India Company, by the name of New Netherlands.

The claim of the Dutch was always contested by the English; not because they questioned the title given by discovery, but because they insisted on being themselves the rightful claimants under that title. Their pretensions were finally decided by the sword.

No one of the powers of Europe gave its full assent to this principle more unequivocally than England. The documents upon this subject are ample and complete. So early as the year 1496, her monarch granted a commission to the Cabots, to discover countries then unknown to Christian people, and to take possession of them in the name of the King of England. Two years afterwards, Cabot proceeded on this voyage, and discovered the continent of North America, along which he sailed as far south as Virginia. To this discovery the English trace their title.

In this first effort made by the English government to acquire territory on this continent, we perceive a complete recognition of the principle which has been mentioned. The right of discovery given by this commission is confined to countries "then unknown to all Christian people;" and of these countries Cabot was empowered to take possession in the name of the King of England, thus asserting a right to take possession, *notwithstanding the occupancy of the natives, who were heathens, and at the same time admitting the prior title of any Christian people who may have made a previous discovery.

The same principle continued to be recognized. The charter granted to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, in 1578, authorizes him to discover and take possession of such remote, heathen and barbarous lands as were not actually possessed by any Christian prince or people. This charter was afterwards renewed to Sir Walter Raleigh, in nearly the same terms.

By the charter of 1606, under which the first permanent English settlement on this continent was made, James I. granted to Sir Thomas Gates and others, those territories in America lying on the sea-coast, between the thirty-fourth and forty-fifth degrees of north latitude, and which either belonged to that monarch, or were not then possessed by any other Christian prince or people. The grantees were divided into two companies at their own request. The first, or southern colony, was directed to settle between the thirty-fourth and forty-first degrees of north latitude; and the second, or northern colony, between the thirty-eighth and forty-fifth degrees.

In 1609, after some expensive and not very successful attempts at settlement had been made, a new and more enlarged charter was given by the crown to the first colony, in which the king granted to the "Treasurer and Company of Adventurers of the city of London for the first Colony in Virginia," in absolute property, the lands extending along the sea-coast four hundred miles, and *into the land <sup>[578]</sup> throughout from sea to sea. This charter, which is a part of the special verdict in this cause, was annulled, so far as respected the rights of the company, by the judgment of the Court of King's Bench on a writ of quo warranto; but the whole effect allowed to this judgment was to revest in the crown the powers of government, and the title to the land within its limits.

At the solicitation of those who held under the grant to the second or northern colony, a new and more enlarged charter was granted to the Duke of Lenox and others, in 1620, who were denominated the Plymouth Company, conveying to them in absolute property all the lands between the fortieth and forty-eighth degrees of north latitude.

Under this patent, New England has been in a great measure settled. The company conveyed to Henry Rosewell and others, in 1627, that territory which is now Massachusetts; and in 1628, a charter of incorporation, comprehending the powers of government, was granted to the purchasers.

Great part of New England was granted by this company, which, at length, divided their remaining lands among themselves; and, in 1635, surrendered their charter to the crown. A patent was granted to Gorges for Maine, which was allotted to him in the division of property.

All the grants made by the Plymouth Company, so far as we can learn, have been respected. In pursuance of the same principle, the King, in 1664, granted to the Duke of York the country of New England as far south as 579* the Delaware Bay. His Royal Highness transferred New Jersey to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret.

In 1663, the crown granted to Lord Clarendon and others, the country lying between the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude and the river St. Mathes; and, in 1666, the proprietors obtained from the crown a new charter, granting to them that province in the King's dominions in North America which lies from thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude to the twenty-ninth degree, and from the Atlantic Ocean to the South Sea.

Thus has our whole country been granted by the crown while in the occupation of the Indians. These grants purport to convey the soil as well as the right of dominion to the grantees. In those governments which were denominated royal, where the right to the soil was not vested in individuals, but remained in the crown, or was vested in the colonial government, the king claimed and exercised the right of granting lands, and of dismembering the government at his will. The grants made out of the two original colonies, after the resumption of their charters by the crown, are examples of this. The governments of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and a part of Carolina, were thus created. In all of them, the soil, at the time the grants were made, was occupied by the Indians. Yet almost every title within those governments is dependent on these grants. In some instances, the soil was conveyed by the crown unaccompanied by the powers of government, as in the case of the northern neck of 580* Virginia. It has never been objected to this, or to any other similar grant, that the title as well as possession was in the Indians when it was made, and that it passed nothing on that account.

These various patents cannot be considered as nullities; nor can they be limited to a mere grant of the powers of government. A charter intended to convey political power only, would never contain words expressly granting the land, the soil and the waters. Some of them purport to convey the soil alone; and in those cases in which the powers of government, as well as the soil, are conveyed to individuals, the crown has always acknowledged itself to be bound by the grant. Though the power to dismember regal governments was asserted and exercised, the power to dismember proprietary governments was not claimed; and, in some instances, even after the powers of government were revested in the crown, the title of the proprietors to the soil was respected.

Charles II. was extremely anxious to acquire the property of Maine, but the grantees sold it to Massachusetts, and he did not venture to contest the right of that colony to the soil. The Carolinas were originally proprietary governments. In 1721 a revolution was effected by the people, who shook off their obedience to the proprietors, and declared their dependence immediately on the crown. The king, however, purchased the title of those who were disposed to sell. One of them, Lord Carteret, surrendered his interest in the government, but retained his title to the soil. That title *581 was respected till the revolution, when it was forfeited by the laws of war.

Further proofs of the extent to which this principle has been recognized, will be found in the history of the wars, negotiations and treaties which the different nations, claiming territory in America, have carried on and held with each other.

The contests between the cabinets of Versailles and Madrid, respecting the territory on the northern coast of the Gulf of Mexico, were fierce and bloody, and continued until the establishment of a Bourbon on the throne of Spain produced such amicable dispositions in the two crowns as to suspend or terminate them.

Between France and Great Britain, whose discoveries as well as settlements were nearly contemporaneous, contests for the country, actually covered by the Indians, began as soon as their settlements approached each other, and were continued until finally settled in the year 1763, by the treaty of Paris.

Each nation had granted and partially settled the country, denominated by the French, Arcadie, and by the English, Nova Scotia. By the twelfth article of the treaty of Utrecht, made in 1703, His Most Christian Majesty ceded to the Queen of Great Britain, "all Nova Scotia or Acadie, with its ancient boundaries." A great part of the ceded territory was in the possession of the Indians, and the extent of the cession could not be adjusted by the commissioners to whom it was to be referred.

The treaty of Aix la Chapelle, which was made on the principle of the status *582 ante bellum, did not remove this subject of controversy. Commissioners for its adjustment were appointed, whose very able and elaborate, though unsuccessful arguments, in favor of the title of their respective sovereigns, show how entirely each relied on the title given by discovery to lands remaining in the possession of Indians.

After the termination of this fruitless discussion, the subject was transferred to Europe, and taken up by the cabinets of Versailles and London. This controversy embraced not only the boundaries of New England, Nova Scotia, and that part of Canada which adjoined those colonies, but embraced our whole western country also. France contended not only that the St. Lawrence was to be considered as the center of Canada, but that the Ohio was within that colony. She founded this claim on discovery, and on having used that river for the transportation of troops, in a war with some southern Indians.

This river was comprehended in the chartered limits of Virginia; but, though the right of England to a reasonable extent of country, in virtue of her discovery of the sea-coast, and of the settlements she made on it, was not to be questioned; her claim of all the lands to the Pacific Ocean, because she had discovered the country washed by the Atlantic, might, without derogating from the principle recognized by all, be deemed extravagant. It interfered, too, with the claims of France, founded on the same principle. She therefore sought to 583 strengthen her original title to *the lands in controversy, by insisting that it had been acknowledged by France in the fifteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht. The dispute respecting the construction of that article has no tendency to impair the principle that discovery gave a title to lands still remaining in the possession of the Indians. Whichever title prevailed, it was still a title to lands occupied by the Indians, whose right of occupancy neither controverted, and neither had then extinguished.

These conflicting claims produced a long and bloody war, which was terminated by the conquest of the whole country east of the Mississippi. In the treaty of 1763, France ceded and guaranteed to Great Britain, all Nova Scotia, or Acadie, and Canada, with their dependencies; and it was agreed that the boundaries between the territories of the two nations, in America, should be irrevocably fixed by a line drawn from the source of the Mississippi, through the middle of that river and the lakes Maurepas and Ponchartrain, to the sea. This treaty expressly cedes, and has always been understood to cede, the whole country, on the English side of the dividing line, between the two nations, although a great and valuable part of it was occupied by the Indians. Great Britain, on her part, surrendered to France all her pretensions to the country west of the Mississippi. It has never been supposed that she surrendered nothing, although she was not in actual possession of a foot of land. She surrendered all right to acquire the country; and any after attempt to purchase it from the Indians 584 would have been considered *and treated as an invasion of the territories of France.

By the twentieth article of the same treaty, Spain ceded Florida, with its dependencies, and all the country she claimed east or south-east of the Mississippi, to Great Britain. Great part of this territory also was in possession of the Indians.

By a secret treaty, which was executed about the same time, France ceded Louisiana to Spain; and Spain has since retroceded the same country to France. At the time both of its cession and retrocession, it was occupied chiefly by the Indians.

Thus, all the nations of Europe, who have acquired territory on this continent, have asserted in themselves, and have recognized in others, the exclusive right of the discoverer to appropriate the lands occupied by the Indians. Have the American states rejected or adopted this principle?

By the treaty which concluded the war of our revolution, Great Britain relinquished all claim, not only to the government, but to the "propriety and territorial rights of the United States," whose boundaries were fixed in the second article. By this treaty, the powers of government, and the right to soil, which had previously been in Great Britain, passed definitively to these states. We had before taken possession of them, by declaring independence; but neither the declaration of independence, nor the treaty confirming it, could give us more than that which we before possessed, or to which Great Britain was before entitled. It *has never been doubted, that either [585 the United States, or the several states, had a clear title to all the lands within the boundary lines described in the treaty, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy, and that the exclusive power to extinguish that right was vested in that government which might constitutionally exercise it.

Virginia, particularly, within whose chartered limits the land in controversy lay, passed an act in the year 1779, declaring her "exclusive right of pre-emption from the Indians, of all the lands within the limits of her own chartered territory, and that no person or persons whatsoever, have, or ever had, a right to purchase any lands within the same, from any Indian nation, except only persons duly authorized to make such purchase, formerly for the use and benefit of the colony, and lately for the commonwealth." The act then proceeds to annul all deeds made by Indians to individuals, for the private use of the purchasers.

Without ascribing to this act the power of annulling vested rights, or admitting it to countervail the testimony furnished by the marginal note opposite to the title of the law, forbidding purchases from the Indians, in the revisals of the Virginia statutes, stating that law to be repealed, it may safely be considered as an unequivocal affirmance, on the part of Virginia, of the broad principle which had always been maintained that the exclusive right to purchase from the Indians resided in the government.

In pursuance of the same idea, Virginia proceeded, at the same session, to open her land-office, *for the sale of that country [586 which now constitutes Kentucky—a country, every acre of which was then claimed and possessed by Indians, who maintained their title with as much persevering courage as was ever manifested by any people.

The states, having within their chartered limits different portions of territory covered by Indians, ceded that territory, generally, to the United States, on conditions expressed in their deeds of cession, which demonstrate the opinion that they ceded the soil as well as jurisdiction, and that in doing so they granted a productive fund to the government of the Union. The lands in controversy lay within the chartered limits of Virginia, and were ceded with the whole country north-west of the river Ohio. This grant contained reservations and stipulations which could only be made by the owners of the soil; and concluded with a stipulation that "all the lands in the ceded territory, not reserved, should be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation," &c., "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

The ceded territory was occupied by numerous and warlike tribes of Indians; but the exclusive right of the United States to extinguish their title, and to grant the soil, has never, we believe, been doubted.

587*] *After these states became independent, a controversy subsisted between them and Spain respecting boundary. By the treaty of 1795, this controversy was adjusted, and Spain ceded to the United States the territory in question. This territory, though claimed by both nations, was chiefly in the actual occupation of Indians.

The magnificent purchase of Louisiana was the purchase from France of a country almost entirely occupied by numerous tribes of Indians, who are in fact independent. Yet any attempt of others to intrude into that country would be considered as an aggression which would justify war.

Our late acquisitions from Spain are of the same character; and the negotiations which preceded those acquisitions recognize and elucidate the principle which has been received as the foundation of all European title in America.

The United States, then, have unequivocally acceded to that great and broad rule by which its civilized inhabitants now hold this country. They hold, and assert in themselves, the title by which it was acquired. They maintain, as all others have maintained, that discovery gave an exclusive right to extinguish the Indian title of occupancy, either by purchase or by conquest; and gave also a right to such a degree of sovereignty as the circumstances of the people would allow them to exercise.

The power now possessed by the government of the United States to grant lands, resided, while we were colonies, in the crown, or its grantees. The validity of the titles given by 588*] either has never *been questioned in our courts. It has been exercised uniformly over territory in possession of the Indians. The existence of this power must negative the existence of any right which may conflict with, and control it. An absolute title to lands cannot exist, at the same time, in different persons, or in different governments. An absolute, must be an exclusive title, or at least a title which excludes all others not compatible with it. All our institutions recognize the absolute title of the crown, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy, and recognized the absolute title of the crown to extinguish that right. This is incompatible with an absolute and complete title in the Indians.

We will not enter into the controversy, whether agriculturists, merchants, and manufacturers, have a right, on abstract principles, to expel hunters from the territory they possess, or to contract their limits. Conquest gives a title which the courts of the conqueror cannot deny, whatever the private and speculative opinions of individuals may be, respecting the original justice of the claim which has been successfully asserted. The British government, which was then our government, and whose rights have passed to the United States, asserted a title to all the lands occupied by Indians within the chartered limits of the British colonies. It asserted also a limited sovereignty over them, and the exclusive right of extinguishing the title which occupancy gave to them. These claims have been maintained and established as far west as the river Mississippi, by the sword. The title *to a vast portion [589 of the lands we now hold, originates in them. It is not for the courts of this country to question the validity of this title, or to sustain one which is incompatible with it.

Although we do not mean to engage in the defense of those principles which Europeans have applied to Indian title, they may, we think, find some excuse, if not justification, in the character and habits of the people whose rights have been wrested from them.

The title by conquest is acquired and maintained by force. The conqueror prescribes its limits. Humanity, however, acting on public opinion, has established, as a general rule, that the conquered shall not be wantonly oppressed, and that their condition shall remain as eligible as is compatible with the objects of the conquest. Most usually they are incorporated with the victorious nation and become subjects or citizens of the government with which they are connected. The new and old members of the society mingle with each other; the distinction between them is gradually lost, and they make one people. Where this incorporation is practicable, humanity demands, and a wise policy requires, that the rights of the conquered to property should remain unimpaired; that the new subjects should be governed as equitably as the old, and that confidence in their security should gradually banish the painful sense of being separated from their ancient connections, and united by force to strangers.

When the conquest is complete, and the conquered inhabitants can be blended with the conquerors, *or safely governed as a [590 distinct people, public opinion, which not even the conqueror can disregard, imposes these restraints upon him; and he cannot neglect them without injury to his fame, and hazard to his power.

But the tribes of Indians inhabiting this country were fierce savages, whose occupation was war, and whose subsistence was drawn chiefly from the forest. To leave them in possession of their country was to leave the country a wilderness; to govern them as a distinct people was impossible, because they were as brave and as high spirited as they were fierce, and were ready to repel by arms every attempt on their independence.

What was the inevitable consequence of this state of things? The Europeans were under the necessity either of abandoning the country, and relinquishing their pompous claims to it, or of enforcing those claims by the sword, and by the adoption of principles adapted to the condition of a people with whom it was impossible to mix, and who could not be governed as a distinct society, or of remaining in their neighborhood and exposing themselves and their families to the perpetual hazard of being massacred.

Frequent and bloody wars, in which the whites were not always the aggressors, unavoidably ensued. European policy, numbers and skill, prevailed. As the white population advanced, that of the Indians necessarily receded. The country in the immediate neighborhood of agriculturalists became unfit for 591* them. The game fled *into thicker and more unbroken forests, and the Indians followed. The soil, to which the crown originally claimed title, being no longer occupied by its ancient inhabitants, was parceled out according to the will of the sovereign power, and taken possession of by persons who claimed immediately from the crown, or mediately, through its grantees or deputies.

That law which regulates, and ought to regulate in general, the relations between the conqueror and conquered, was incapable of application to a people under such circumstances. The resort to some new and different rule, better adapted to the actual state of things, was unavoidable. Every rule which can be suggested will be found to be attended with great difficulty.

However extravagant the pretension of converting the discovery of an inhabited country into conquest may appear, if the principle has been asserted in the first instance, and afterwards sustained; if a country has been acquired and held under it; if the property of the great mass of the community originates in it, it becomes the law of the land, and cannot be questioned. So, too, with respect to the concomitant principle, that the Indian inhabitants are to be considered merely as occupants, to be protected, indeed, while in peace, in the possession of their lands, but to be deemed incapable of transferring the absolute title to others. However this restriction may be opposed to natural right, and to the usages of civilized nations, yet, if it be indispensable to that system under which the country has been 592* settled, and be *adapted to the actual condition of the two people, it may, perhaps, be supported by reason, and certainly cannot be rejected by courts of justice.

This question is not entirely new in this court. The case of Fletcher v. Peck grew out of a sale made by the state of Georgia of a large tract of country within the limits of that state, the grant of which was afterwards resumed. The action was brought by a sub-purchaser, on the contract of sale, and one of the covenants in the deed was, that the state of Georgia was, at the time of sale, seized in fee of the premises. The real question presented by the issue was, whether the seisin in fee was in the state of Georgia, or in the United States. After stating that this controversy between the several states and the United States had been compromised, the court thought it necessary to notice the Indian title, which, although entitled to the respect of all courts until it should be legitimately extinguished, was declared not to be such as to be absolutely repugnant to a seisin in fee on the part of the state.

This opinion conforms precisely to the principle which has been supposed to be recognized by all European governments, from the first Wheat. 8.

settlement of America. The absolute ultimate title has been considered as acquired by discovery, subject only to the Indian title of occupancy, which title the discoverers possessed the exclusive right of acquiring. Such a right is no more incompatible with a seisin in fee than a lease for years, and might as effectually bar an ejectment.

Another view has been taken of this question, *which deserves to be considered. [593 The title of the crown, whatever it might be, could be acquired only by a conveyance from the crown. If an individual might extinguish the Indian title for his own benefit, or, in other words, might purchase it, still he could acquire only that title. Admitting their power to change their laws or usages, so far as to allow an individual to separate a portion of their lands from the common stock, and hold it in severalty, still it is a part of their territory, and is held under them, by a title dependent on their laws. The grant derives its efficacy from their will; and, if they choose to resume it, and make a different disposition of the land, the courts of the United States cannot interpose for the protection of the title. The person who purchases lands from the Indians, within their territory, incorporates himself with them, so far as respects the property purchased; holds their title under their protection, and subject to their laws. If they annul the grant, we know of no tribunal which can revise and set aside the proceeding. We know of no principle which can distinguish this case from a grant made to a native Indian, authorizing him to hold a particular tract of land in severalty.

As such a grant could not separate the Indian from his nation, nor give a title which our courts could distinguish from the title of his tribe, as it might still be conquered from, or ceded by his tribe, we can perceive no legal principle which will authorize a court to say that different consequences are attached to this purchase, because it was made by a stranger. By the treaties concluded *between the [594 United States and the Indian nations, whose title the plaintiffs claim, the country comprehending the lands in controversy has been ceded to the United States, without any reservation of their title. These nations had been at war with the United States, and had an unquestionable right to annul any grant they had made to American citizens. Their cession of the country, without a reservation of this land, affords a fair presumption that they considered it as of no validity. They ceded to the United States this very property, after having used it in common with other lands, as their own, from the date of their deeds to the time of cession; and the attempt now made is to set up their title against that of the United States.

The proclamation issued by the King of Great Britain, in 1763, has been considered, and we think with reason, as constituting an additional objection to the title of the plaintiffs.

By that proclamation, the crown reserved under its own dominion and protection, for the use of the Indians, "all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and north-west," and strictly forbade all British subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of the reserved lands.

It has been contended that, in this proclamation, the King transcended his constitutional powers; and the case of Campbell v. Hall (reported by Cowper) is relied on to support this position.

595* It is supposed to be a principle of universal law that, if an uninhabited country be discovered by a number of individuals, who acknowledge no connection with, and owe no allegiance to, any government whatever, the country becomes the property of the discoverers, so far at least as they can use it. They acquire a title in common. The title of the whole land is in the whole society. It is to be divided and parceled out according to the will of the society, expressed by the whole body, or by that organ which is authorized by the whole to express it.

If the discovery be made, and possession of the country be taken, under the authority of an existing government, which is acknowledged by the emigrants, it is supposed to be equally well settled that the discovery is made for the whole nation, that the country becomes a part of the nation, and that the vacant soil is to be disposed of by that organ of the government which has the constitutional power to dispose of the national domains, by that organ in which all vacant territory is vested by law.

According to the theory of the British constitution, all vacant lands are vested in the crown, as representing the nation; and the exclusive power to grant them is admitted to reside in the crown, as a branch of the royal prerogative. It has been already shown that this principle was as fully recognized in America as in the island of Great Britain. All the lands we hold were originally granted by the crown; and the establishment of a regal government has never been considered as *impairing its right to grant lands within the chartered limits of such colony. In addition to the proof of this principle, furnished by the immense grants, already mentioned, of lands lying within the chartered limits of Virginia, the continuing right of the crown to grant lands lying within that colony was always admitted. A title might be obtained, either by making an entry with the surveyor of a county, in pursuance of law, or by an order of the governor in council, who was the deputy of the King, or by an immediate grant from the crown. In Virginia, therefore, as well as elsewhere in the British dominions, the complete title of the crown to vacant lands was acknowledged.

So far as respected the authority of the crown, no distinction was taken between vacant lands and lands occupied by the Indians. The title, subject only to the right of occupancy by the Indians, was admitted to be in the King, as was his right to grant that title. The lands, then, to which this proclamation referred, were lands which the King had a right to grant, or to reserve for the Indians.

According to the theory of the British constitution, the royal prerogative is very extensive so far as respects the political relations between Great Britain and foreign nations. The peculiar situation of the Indians, necessarily considered in some respects, as a dependent, and in some respects as a distinct people, occupying a country claimed by Great Britain, and yet too powerful and brave not to be dreaded as formidable enemies, required that means should be adopted for *the preservation of peace, [597 and that their friendship should be secured by quieting their alarms for their property. This was to be effected by restraining the encroachments of the whites; and the power to do this was never, we believe, denied by the colonies to the crown.

In the case of Campbell against Hall, that part of the proclamation was determined to be illegal which imposed a tax on a conquered province, after a government had been bestowed upon it. The correctness of this decision cannot be questioned, but its application to the case at bar cannot be admitted. Since the expulsion of the Stuart family, the power of imposing taxes, by proclamation, has never been claimed as a branch of regal prerogative; but the powers of granting, or refusing to grant, vacant lands, and of restraining encroachments on the Indians, have always been asserted and admitted.

The authority of this proclamation, so far as it respected this continent, has never been denied, and the titles it gave to lands have always been sustained in our courts.

In the argument of this cause, the counsel for the plaintiffs have relied very much on the opinions expressed by men holding offices of trust, and on various proceedings in America, to sustain titles to land derived from the Indians.

The collection of claims to lands lying in the western country, made in the first volume of the Laws of the United States, has been referred to; but we find nothing in that collection to support the argument. Most of the titles were derived *from persons professing to act [598 under the authority of the government existing at the time; and the two grants under which the plaintiffs claim are supposed, by the person under whose inspection the collection was made, to be void because forbidden by the royal proclamation of 1763. It is not unworthy of remark that the usual mode adopted by the Indians for granting lands to individuals has been to reserve them in the treaty, or to grant them under the sanction of the commissioners with whom the treaty was negotiated. The practice, in such case, to grant to the crown, for the use of the individual, is some evidence of a general understanding that the validity even of such a grant depended on its receiving the royal sanction.

The controversy between the colony of Connecticut and the Mohegan Indians, depended on the nature and extent of a grant made by those Indians, to the colony; on the nature and extent of the reservations made by the Indians in their several deeds and treaties, which were alleged to be recognized by the legitimate authority, and on the violation by the colony of rights thus reserved and secured. We do not perceive, in that case, any assertion of the principle that individuals might obtain a complete and valid title from the Indians.

It has been stated, that in the memorial transmitted from the cabinet of London to that of Versailles, during the controversy between the two nations respecting boundary, which took place in 1755, the Indian right to the soil is rec-

599]* ognized. *But this recognition was made with reference to their character as Indians, and for the purpose of showing that they were fixed to a particular territory. It was made for the purpose of sustaining the claim of His Britannic Majesty to dominion over them.

The opinion of the Attorney and Solicitor-General, Pratt and Yorke, have been adduced to prove, that in the opinion of those great law officers, the Indian grant could convey a title to the soil without a patent emanating from the crown. The opinion of those persons would certainly be of great authority on such a question, and we were not a little surprised, when it was read, at the doctrine it seemed to advance. An opinion so contrary to the whole practice of the crown, and to the uniform opinions given on all other occasions by its great law officers, ought to be very explicit, and accompanied by the circumstances under which it was given and to which it was applied, before we can be assured that it is properly understood. In a pamphlet, written for the purpose of asserting the Indian title, styled "Plain Facts," the same opinion is quoted, and is said to relate to purchases made in the East Indies. It is, of course, entirely inapplicable to purchases made in America. Chalmers, in whose collection this opinion is found, does not say to whom it applies; but there is reason to believe, that the author of "Plain Facts" is, in this respect, correct. The opinion commences thus: "In respect to such places as have been, or shall be acquired, by treaty or grant, from any of the Indian princes or governments, your 600]* *majesty's letters patent are not necessary." The words "princes or governments" are usually applied to the East Indians, but not to those of North America. We speak of their sachems, their warriors, their chiefs, their nations or tribes, not of their "princes or governments." The question on which the opinion was given, too, and to which it relates, was whether the King's subjects carry with them the common law wherever they may form settlements. The opinion is given with a view to this point, and its object must be kept in mind while construing its expressions.

Much reliance is also placed on the fact that many tracts are now held in the United States under the Indian title, the validity of which is not questioned.

Before the importance attached to this fact is conceded, the circumstances under which such grants were obtained, and such titles are supported, ought to be considered. These lands lie chiefly in the eastern states. It is known that the Plymouth Company made many extensive grants, which, from their ignorance of the country, interfered with each other. It is also known that Mason, to whom New Hampshire, and Gorges, to whom Maine was granted, found great difficulty in managing such unwieldy property. The country was settled by emigrants, some from Europe, but chiefly from Massachusetts, who took possession of lands they found unoccupied, and secured themselves in that possession by the best means in their 601]* power. The disturbances in *England, and the civil war and revolution which followed those disturbances, prevented any interference on the part of the mother country, and the proprietors were unable to maintain their Wheat. 8.

title. In the meantime, Massachusetts claimed the country and governed it. As her claim was adversary to that of the proprietors, she encouraged the settlement of persons made under her authority, and encouraged, likewise, their securing themselves in possession, by purchasing the acquiescence and forbearance of the Indians.

After the restoration of Charles II., Gorges and Mason, when they attempted to establish their title, found themselves opposed by men, who held under Massachusetts and under the Indians. The title of the proprietors was resisted; and though, in some cases, compromises were made, and in some, the opinion of a court was given ultimately in their favor, the juries found uniformly against them. They became wearied with the struggle, and sold their property. The titles held under the Indians were sanctioned by length of possession; but there is no case, so far as we are informed, of a judicial decision in their favor.

Much reliance has also been placed on a recital contained in the charter of Rhode Island, and on a letter addressed to the governors of the neighboring colonies by the King's command, in which some expressions are inserted, indicating the royal approbation of titles acquired from the Indians.

The charter to Rhode Island recites "that the said John Clark, and others, had transplanted *themselves into the midst of [602 the Indian nations, and were seized and possessed, by purchase and consent of the said natives, to their full content, of such lands," &c. And the letter recites that "Thomas Chifflinch, and others, having, in the right of Major Aspertown, a just propriety in the Narragansett country, in New England, by grants from the native princes of that country, and being desirous to improve it into an English colony," &c., "are yet daily disturbed."

The impression this language might make, if viewed apart from the circumstances under which it was employed, will be effaced, when considered in connection with those circumstances.

In the year 1635, the Plymouth Company surrendered their charter to the crown. About the same time, the religious dissensions of Massachusetts expelled from that colony several societies of individuals, one of which settled in Rhode Island, on lands purchased from the Indians. They were not within the chartered limits of Massachusetts, and the English government was too much occupied at home to bestow its attention on this subject. There existed no authority to arrest their settlement of the country. If they obtained the Indian title, there were none to assert the title of the crown. Under these circumstances, the settlement became considerable. Individuals acquired separate property in lands which they cultivated and improved; a government was established among themselves; and no power existed in America which could rightfully interfere with it.

On the restoration of Charles II., this small society *hastened to acknowledge his [603 authority, and to solicit his confirmation of their title to the soil, and to jurisdiction over the country. Their solicitations were successful, and a charter was granted to them, containing the recital which has been mentioned.

It is obvious that this transaction can amount to no acknowledgment that the Indian grant could convey a title paramount to that of the crown, or could, in itself, constitute a complete title. On the contrary, the charter of the crown was considered as indispensable to its completion.

It has never been contended that the Indian title amounted to nothing. Their right of possession has never been questioned. The claim of government extends to the complete ultimate title, charged with this right of possession, and to the exclusive power of acquiring that right. The object of the crown was to settle the sea-coast of America; and when a portion of it was settled, without violating the rights of others, by persons professing their loyalty, and soliciting the royal sanction of an act, the consequences of which were ascertained to be beneficial, it would have been as unwise as ungracious to expel them from their habitations because they had obtained the Indian title otherwise than through the agency of government. The very grant of a charter is an assertion of the title of the crown, and its words convey the same idea. The country granted is said to be "our island called Rhode Island;" and the charter contains an actual grant of the soil, as well as of the powers of government.

604*] The letter was written a few months before the charter was issued, apparently at the request of the agents of the intended colony, for the sole purpose of preventing the trespasses of neighbors, who were disposed to claim some authority over them. The King, being willing himself to ratify and confirm their title, was, of course, inclined to quiet them in their possession.

This charter, and this letter, certainly sanction a previous unauthorized purchase from Indians, under the circumstances attending that particular purchase, but are far from supporting the general proposition that a title acquired from the Indians would be valid against a title acquired from the crown, or without the confirmation of the crown.

The acts of the several colonial assemblies, prohibiting purchases from the Indians, have also been relied on, as proving that, independent of such prohibitions, Indian deeds would be valid. But we think this fact, at most, equivocal. While the existence of such purchases would justify their prohibition, even by colonies which considered Indian deeds as previously invalid, the fact that such acts have been generally passed, is strong evidence of the general opinion that such purchases are opposed by the soundest principles of wisdom and national policy.

After bestowing on this subject a degree of attention which was more required by the magnitude of the interest in litigation, and the able and elaborate arguments of the bar, than by its intrinsic difficulty, the court is decidedly of opinion that the plaintiffs do not exhibit a title 605*] which can be sustained in the courts of the United States, and that there is no error in the judgment which was rendered against them in the District Court of Illinois.

JOHN PALMER ET AL., Defendants in Error.

By a charter-party, the sum of $30,000 was agreed to be paid for the use or hire of the ship, on a voyage from Philadelphia to Madeira, and thence to Bombay, and at the option of the charterer to Calcutta, and back to Philadelphia (with an addition of $2,000, if she should proceed to Calcutta), the whole payable on the return of the ship to Philadelphia and before the discharge of her cargo there, in approved notes, not exceeding an average time of ninety days from the time at which she should be ready to discharge her cargo. The charterer proceeded in the ship to Calcutta, and, with the consent of the master (who was appointed by the ship-owners), entered into an agreement with P. & Co., merchants there, that if they would make him an advance of money, he would deliver to them a bill of lading stipulating for the delivery of the goods purchased therewith to their agents in Philadelphia, free of freight, who should be authorized to sell the same and apply the proceeds to the repayment of the said advance, unless the charterer's bills, drawn on G. & S., of Philadelphia, should be accepted, in which event the agents of P. & Co. should deliver the goods to the charterer. The goods were shipped accordingly, and a bill of lading signed by the master, with the clause "freight for the said goods having been settled here." The bills of exchange drawn by the charterer were refused acceptance, and the agents of P. & Co. demanded the goods, which the owners of the ship refused to deliver without the payment of freight. Held, that the owners of the ship had a lien on these goods for the freight.

*ERROR to the Circuit Court for the [*606
Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

This was an action of assumpsit, brought by the defendants in error against the plaintiffs in error, to recover back the sum of $10,500, paid under the circumstances stated in the following case, to be considered as a special verdict:

On the 23d of October, 1818, the defendants, being the owners of the ship America, chartered her to Hugh Chambers, by the following charter-party: "This charter-party, indented, made and entered upon, this 23d day of October, in the year of our Lord 1818, between Archibald Gracie, William Graeie and Charles King, the persons constituting the copartnership or house of trade, under the firm and style of Archibald Gracie & Sons, of the city of New York, owners of the ship or vessel called the America, of New York, of the burden of 460 tons, or thereabouts, register admeasurement, of the first part, and Hugh Chambers, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, of the other part, witnesseth, that the said owners have let, and the said Hugh Chambers hath taken and hired the said vessel, to freight for the voyage, upon the terms and conditions following: Whereupon the said owners do covenant, promise and agree, to and with the said charterer, by these presents, that the said vessel shall be tight, staunch and strong, well and sufficiently fitted, manned, provided and furnished with all things needful and necessary for such vessel, on her intended voyage, hereinafter mentioned, and provisioned for the merchandise, usually chargeable with, or taken on, freight, by weight, that the same shall be estimated at such rate as shall be equivalent to that sum by the ton; and also, that the commission to be allowed the supercargo of the said ship, shall be a clear commission of five per centum on the amount of the investment in India. And it is further agreed, that the said charterer shall furnish and supply the needful and sufficient cabin stores to and for the supercargo, master and officers of the said ship, for the said voyage, and that the owners shall and will allow, and pay to him therefor, the sum of $1,500; and, also, that the cabin shall belong to the said charterer, excepting the respective state-rooms in which the master and officers shall sleep. And it is hereby further agreed, and granted and reserved, that the master shall have a privilege of six cubic tons, freight free; the first officer a like free privilege of three cubic tons, and the second officer a like free privilege of two cubic tons, provided, that neither of the said privileges shall be used for the purpose of shipping flour out in the said ship. And the said charterer, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, doth hereby covenant and agree with the said owners, that the said charterer will well and truly pay and satisfy all the port charges and expenses of the said ship, as well abroad as at Philadelphia aforesaid, until she shall have discharged *her return [610 cargo, excepting always the sea-stores, the wages of the master, officers, and crew, and the repairs and outfits of the said ship, with all which she is to be chargeable. And it is hereby further agreed, that there be allowed, and are granted one hundred and twenty working days in all, for the loading and unloading of the said ship at the ports and places of loading and delivery, and that the time not used and occupied at one port or place, may be taken or made up at the others, so that the whole do not exceed the number allowed as above mentioned; and that for every detention, over and above the said one hundred and twenty days, the said charterers shall pay to the said owners the sum of $75 per day, to be paid in like manner as the freight. And the said charterer, for himself, his heirs, executors and administrators, doth hereby promise and agree, with the said owners, their executors, administrators and assigns, that he will cause the said ship or vessel to be loaded at the said port of Philadelphia, on her being in readiness to receive her funds and cargo there, and reloaded at the Island of Madeira, and at Bombay, and Calcutta, in the manner above expressed; and that he will pay to them, on the return of the said ship to Philadelphia, and before the discharge of her cargo there, in approved notes, not exceeding an average time of ninety days from the time at which she shall be ready to discharge her cargo, the clear sum of $30,000; and if she shall have proceeded to Calcutta, the further sum of $2,000, for the hire and freight of the said ship, for *the [611 said voyage. In witness whereof, the said owners and charterer have to these presents, in duplicate, set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

607 term of eighteen months, and *fully and properly armed with large and small arms, and with sufficient ammunition for the same; and that she shall, on or before the 15th day of November next, be in readiness, at the port of Philadelphia, to receive and take on board, and shall there, when tendered within reach of her tackle, receive and take on board all such lawful goods and merchandise as the said charterer may think proper to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably store and carry, over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, armament and other necessities, and the privileges hereinafter reserved for the master, and first and second officers, and the lading of the dollars to be shipped by the owners, as hereinafter mentioned; and that the said ship shall be in readiness to sail from Philadelphia aforesaid, and, on being loaded and afterwards despatched, shall and will (wind and weather permitting) set sail from the said port of Philadelphia, on or before the 30th day of November next, and proceed to the Island of Madeira; and shall and will there make a right and true delivery of such quantities of goods and merchandise, as shall be there deliverable, loaded at Philadelphia aforesaid, to such persons as the same shall have been consigned to; and the same being so unloaded, the said ship shall and will receive and take on board all such legal goods, wares and merchandise whatsoever, as shall be offered and tendered, within reach of her tackle, by or for account of the said Hugh Chambers, not exceeding as aforesaid. And as soon as the said ship shall be 608 thus loaded at Madeira aforesaid, *she shall and will set sail and depart from thence (wind and weather permitting), and directly proceed on her voyage, and put into the port of Bombay, in the East Indies; and that she shall, at the option of the said Hugh Chambers, his agent or agents, be allowed also to put into Calcutta, and deliver her cargo, and take in returns there. And at the said ports of Bombay and Calcutta, respectively, unlade all such goods and merchandise as shall remain on board, and relade such lawful goods, wares and merchandise as the said charterer, his agents, factors or assigns, shall think fit to charge and lade on board, over and above, and not exceeding as aforesaid, and the lading, for account of the said owners, in respect of the returns for the said funds, in dollars, to be shipped by them; and that the said ship shall and will, with her said return loading (wind and weather permitting), sail and proceed back to the said port of Philadelphia, and there deliver unto the said charterer, his executors, administrators or assigns, the full and entire cargo laden and taken on board the said ship at Bombay and Calcutta, aforesaid, for his account; upon the entire delivery whereof, the said intended voyage shall end and be determined. (The dangers of the seas, restraints of princes and rulers, and all other unavoidable casualties, always being excepted by these presents.) And it is hereby agreed, that the said owners shall load and ship, on board the said vessel, for the said voyage, fifteen thousand Spanish milled dollars, to be invested in goods and merchandise in India, in 609 like manner *as the residue of the cargo in general, and that they shall be chargeable with freight on the returns thereof, at the rate of $50 per ton; or, if the said returns shall be in goods and Wheat. 8.

"ARCH. GRACIE & SONS. [L. S.]
"HUGH CHAMBERS." [L. S.]

On the 28th of November, 1818, the America

sailed from Philadelphia, upon the voyage in the charter-party mentioned, laden with sundry goods, and also $15,000 in specie, the property of the defendants. The flour and other merchandisc were delivered at Madeira, and the quantity of 207 pipes of wine, purchased with the proceeds, or part thereof, was there laden on board the America, and made deliverable in India. The America proceeded from Madeira to Calcutta, where the quantity of about 324 tons of her burthen was filled up from the proceeds of the outward cargo, and with such parts of the wine, taken in at Madeira, as was not disposed of at Calcutta; and the merchandisc so taken in was made deliverable to sundry consignees in the port of Philadelphia. Hugh Chambers, the charterer, was on board the said ship at Calcutta, and it was impracticable to obtain any freight for the said ship at the said port, beyond the amount so laden as aforesaid; nor could any person be induced there to ship on board of her any other goods, deliverable in the United States, upon the condition of paying, or being liable, for any freight whatever. Whereupon, the said Chambers applied to the plaintiffs to make him an advance for the purpose of purchasing merchandisc to ship on 612*] board the *ship America, and did then and there, with the knowledge and consent of Edward Rosseter, the captain or master of the said ship America, enter into an agreement with the plaintiffs that if they would make such an advance, he would leave the merchandisc purchased therewith in their hands, as a security for the said advance while in Calcutta, and would, when shipped on board the America, deliver to them a bill of lading, stipulating for the delivery thereof to their agents in Philadelphia, free of freight, who should be authorized to sell the same and apply the proceeds to the payment of the said advance, unless the said Hugh Chambers' bills for the same, drawn upon Messrs. Grants & Stone, of Philadelphia, should be accepted, and the consignor should feel perfectly assured they would be paid at maturity; in which event the said agents should deliver the said merchandisc to him. That the said plaintiffs accordingly made the said advance, received the said goods as they were purchased, and shipped them on board the said ship America; for which shipment the said master signed and delivered the following bill of lading to the plaintiffs, which the said Chambers indorsed:

"Shipped, in good order, and well conditioned, by Hugh Chambers, in and upon the good ship, called the America, whereof is master for this present voyage, Edward Rosseter, and now lying in the port of Calcutta, and bound for Philadelphia, to say, seven hundred and forty-six bags, and sixty-five boxes of sugar, five hundred and eighty-nine bags of 613*] saltpetre, ten hundred and sixty *bags of ginger, thirty-five bags of aniseed, thirty-two boxes of borax, thirty-two of castor oil, three hundred and three bundles of twine, thirty-five bales of goat skins, six thousand one hundred and sixty horns and horn tips, two hundred and sixty cow hides, fifteen hundred and sixty-nine gunny bags, two bales of seersuckers, two boxes of choppas, six bales of sannahs, five bales of checks, twenty-two bales of gurrahs, and one box of mull muslins, on account and risk of Hugh Chambers, of Philadelphia, being marked and numbered as in the margin; and are to be delivered in the like good order, and well conditioned, at the aforesaid port of Philadelphia (the danger of the seas only excepted), unto Messrs. T. M. & R. Willing, or to their assigns. Freight for the said goods having been settled here.

"In witness whereof, the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to five bills of lading, all of this tenor and date; one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void. Dated, Calcutta, 7th of September, 1819.

"Contents unknown.

"EDWARD ROSSETER."

"Marks and numbers on the back of this bill, countersigned. Hugh Chambers."

That the said Chambers, at the same time, drew and delivered to the plaintiffs, the said bills of exchange upon Messrs. Grants & Stone, for the sum of £8,042 8 4, being the amount of the said advance; which said bills were afterwards duly presented to Grants & Stone for acceptance, who refused to accept the same, and they were afterwards duly protested for *non-payment, and now remain unpaid. *614 That the said agreement to deliver the said goods without paying freight, and the said bill of lading and indorsements, were made by the said Chambers, by Edward Rosseter, and by the plaintiffs, in good faith; and without them the said plaintiffs would not have made the said advance, nor shipped the said goods; and the receipt of the said goods on board the America, by the said master, under the said agreement, and signing the bill of lading in the terms aforesaid, were, under the circumstances of the case at the time, the best he could do for the interest of the owners of the ship. That the said plaintiffs were informed by Hugh Chambers, that the America was chartered by the said Chambers for a specific sum, and that the stock or merchandisc originally placed on board of her at the commencement of the voyage, and its proceeds, were solely and sufficiently a pledge for the payment of the same. That the America arrived in the port of Philadelphia, on or about the 29th of February, 1820, when the defendants gave notice to the said Chambers that they had entered the ship, and were ready to deliver the goods, after payment of the freight stipulated by the charter-party. On the 1st of March, 1820, the said Chambers replied to the defendants, that he was unable to comply with the requisitions of the charter-party. On the 2d of March, 1820, the defendants gave notice to all the consignees of goods on board the America, as by letter of that date to T. M. & R. Willing. On the 3d of March, 1820, Thomas M. & R. Willing, the consignees of the merchandisc shipped by the plaintiffs, demanded *of *615 the defendants, and of Edward Rosseter, the master, the delivery thereof, without paying freight, and protested against the payment of any freight. On the 6th of March, 1820, the defendants refused to deliver the said merchandisc without paying freight. On the same day, the said T. M. & R. Willing, on behalf of the plaintiffs, replied to the defendants, and repeated the protest against paying any freight for the said merchandisc, and their refusal to pay any freight, unless they should be compelled to do it, in order to obtain possession of the said goods. The said T. M. & R. Willing, being unable otherwise to obtain the said merchandises from on board the ship America, paid, as the agents of the plaintiffs, and in their behalf, to the defendants, the sum of $10,000; which payment was made in acceptances of the defendant's drafts, dated the 29th of March, 1820, at ninety days, and duly paid the 30th of June, 1820. The said payment was compelled by the defendants, under their claim of freight, and in consequence of their having the custody of the said merchandises, and was made under protest by the said T. M. & R. Willing. In consequence of the said payment, the said merchandises were delivered by the defendants to the said T. M. & R. Willing, as agents and consignees of the plaintiffs. There were other merchandises on board the said ship, exclusive of those consigned to the said T. M. & R. Willing, sufficient in value to pay the whole freight due by the said charter-party. If, upon the whole matter, the court shall be of opinion that the defendants had no right to detain the 616]* said *goods for freight, judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs for the sum of $10,500, with costs of suit.

If, upon the contrary, the court shall be of opinion that the defendants had such right, then judgment to be entered for the defendants.

Judgment being given upon this case for the plaintiffs below, the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Mr. D. B. Ogden, for the plaintiffs in error, stated that the general principle being that the ship-owners have a lien for the freight, it must be shown that they have parted with it in this case, either by the terms of the charter-party, or are deprived of it by the particular circumstances of the case.

1. As to the terms of the charter-party, the question is whether the possession is fully parted with, so that the charterer has the complete control of the ship.<sup>1</sup> The entire instrument must be taken together, and by that it will appear that the ship-owners hired and paid the master and crew; and there is an express covenant, on the part of the owners, for the carriage and delivery of the goods, and on the part of the charterer for the payment of the freight before the goods are delivered.

2. As to the particular circumstances of the *case, the question is, was any freight [617 due? By the charter-party, the vessel was bound to receive all goods shipped by the charterer or his agent. This cargo was of that description. He borrowed money, and purchased the goods on his own account. They were to be delivered to the Messrs. Willings, as a security for the repayment of the money borrowed, and to be sold by them as the agents of the lender. Can the charterer, by any separate act of his, vary the right of the owner? Must not all the goods shipped by the charterer be considered as under the charter-party? It is not within the scope of the master's authority to dispense with the conditions of the charter-party. The moment the goods were put on board the ship, they were in possession of the owners, who had a lien on them for the freight. The bill of lading could not discharge this lien. The consignees alone were capable of indorsing the bill of lading, so as to operate a valid transfer. The charterer had no right to pay his own debt with the freight due to the owners, and the master had no right to bring goods free of freight.

But suppose the goods were the property of the Messrs. Palmers, the right to freight must depend on the circumstances. The master has power to bind the owner as to the contract of affreightment, but not to transport without freight. The owner may limit his powers by the charter-party; and all that can be required is, that the shipper of goods should know, or have an opportunity of knowing, the restrictions upon the master's authority. The master was not on a general *voyage, seeking [618 for freight, but was to perform his duty to the owners under that charter-party. The shippers knew this, and had an opportunity of inspecting the charter-party, and judging for themselves whether the master was authorized to assent to such a contract. They knew that the cargo was pledged for the freight, both by the general law, and by the particular provisions of this charter-party. This case is precisely similar to the very recent case of Faith v. The East India Company, where the English Court of K. B. held that the ship-owner could not be divested of his lien for freight, by such a transaction between the charterer and shipper, who were cognizant of the terms of the charter-party.<sup>2</sup> The *case of Hutton [619 v. Bragg,<sup>3</sup> which determined against the lien,

1.—Hoe v. Groverman, 1 Cranch's Rep. 237; Marcardier v. Chesapeake Ins. Co., 8 Cranch's Rep. 39, 49; Christie v. Lewis, 2 Brod. & Bingh. 410; The Nereide, 9 Cranch's Rep. 388, 424.

2.—4 Barnw. & Ald. 630. [The case of Faith v. The East India Company, was as follows: The plaintiff, Faith, was the owner of the ship Eliza, of which Sivrac was master, and entered into a charter-party with Gooch, by which freight was agreed to be paid, for the use or hire of the ship, at a certain rate per ton, for a voyage to India, out and home, in the following manner, viz., a certain sum in advance, on the ship's clearing outwards, and the residue, half in cash and half in approved bills, upon the delivery of the homeward cargo. The owner appointed Sivrac master, at the request of Gooch, the charterer, who executed a bond, conditioned for the faithful performance of the master's duty; and the owner instructed the master to be careful to sign all bills of lading with the clause "freight payable as by charter-party." The ship was consigned to Colvins & Co., in Calcutta, by whom she was put up, for her homeward voyage, as a general ship, and different merchants shipped goods by her, C. & Co. taking, for homeward freight, bills payable sixty days after delivery of the cargo; and a new master having been appointed by C. & Co., in conjunction with Sivrac, signed bills of lading with the clause "paying freight agreeable to freight bill." The freight bills were made payable in London, to Bazett & Co., to whom the charterer was indebted for advances on the outward cargo, and who, as well as Colvins & Co., were cognizant of the terms of the charter-party. The Court of King's Bench held that the owner of the ship had a lien on these goods to the extent of the homeward freight. Colvins & Co. also put on board the ship goods purchased by them on account of the charterer; but he being indebted to them, and Bazett & Co., their agents, those goods were, by the bill of lading, consigned to B. & Co. The court also held, that as between the owner of the ship and Bazett & Co., the goods were to be considered as the goods of the charterer, and liable to the owner's lien on them for the freight due by charter-party.]

in a case of a general letting of the ship, has been since overruled.<sup>1</sup>

Mr. Sergeant, contra, contended, 1. That the goods of a third person, carried in a chartered ship, are not liable for the freight due by charter-party, but only for what is due for their own carriage, as stipulated by the bill of lading at the time of shipment. It would follow that if the freight be paid beforehand, bona fide, or it be stipulated that they shall be carried free of freight, they are not liable at all.

2. That the goods in question were, both at law and in equity, the goods of a third person. It would follow, that, having been fairly shipped under an agreement made with the charterer and the master that they should pay no freight, the ship-owners had no lieu upon them.

1. The first position is equally supported by authority, by principle, and by the convenience 620 *and necessities of trade. The case of Paul v. Birch,<sup>2</sup> decided by Lord Hardwicke, in 1743, seems less the introduction of a new doctrine, than an authoritative declaration of what had been before, and was then, understood to be the usage and law. It has since frequently been cited with approbation by elementary writers, and confirmed by judicial authority.<sup>3</sup> The only question growing out of this undeniable position is whether, in the case of a general letting and hiring of a ship, the goods of the charterer himself are liable for the freight.

In Hutton v. Bragg,<sup>4</sup> it was determined by the English Court of C. B., that there was no lien in such a case. This authority has, however, been very much weakened by subsequent decisions,<sup>5</sup> and at last solemnly overruled (Lord Ch. J. Dallas dissenting) by the same court.<sup>6</sup> But in none of these cases is it even intimated that there is any lien upon other goods than those of the charterer for the charter freight. The word freight is used in two different senses. (1) To signify the price or consideration of the carriage of goods on board a ship. (2) To signify the price or hire of a ship for a given time, or for a given employment. The first, which is the appropriate sense of the word, may be, by contract, express or implied; but 621 *the form of the contract is not material. It may be by bill of lading, or it may be by agreement or charter-party; or without stipulating a price.

Now, to constitute a lien, it is necessary. (1) That there be a debt due, on account of the goods of the shipper, for the carriage of those goods. (2) That the goods be in the possession of the creditor, with the assent of the debtor, for the purpose of the carriage from which the debt arises. How is the lien acquired at all, or whenec is the right of lien derived, for freight due by charter-party? If it be asked, how it is derived in the case of a bill of lading, stipulating freight or not, or where there is no bill of lading, the answer is readily furnished. It is a particular lien for the carriage of the goods; the same which a common carrier has by the custom of the realm, and given by the common law, or by the law merchant, which is a part of the common law. It is restricted to the very goods carried; for the common law knows of no such thing as a general lien. The utmost extension it has ever received, is to all the goods in the same bill of lading, and, by a modern decision in England, to goods of the same shipper on board the same ship, though in a different bill of lading.<sup>7</sup> And that is upon the ground of an understanding to that effect, when the first goods are delivered.

The lien for freight due by charter-party stands *precisely on the same founda- 622 tion. A general lien can only be by general usage, by a particular usage, or by contract.<sup>8</sup> The charter-party gives no lien in terms. The ship and goods are (commonly) mutually bound for the performance of the covenants, among which is the covenant for the payment of freight. But here the goods are not so bound; and if they were, it would only extend to the goods of the charterer. But even the goods of the charterer are not bound for the performance of covenants; because, (1) There is no lien for port dues, or demurrage, or any other charges of a similar nature. (2) There is no lien till freight actually earned, and, therefore, not if prevented by the freighter, or by a stranger. Yet the owner can recover on the covenant.<sup>9</sup> (3) There is no lien upon the goods of the charterer for what is termed dead freight, i. e., of the unoccupied space.<sup>10</sup> And this lien has no greater extent in equity than at law.<sup>11</sup> The cases cited, while they disaffirm the lien by contract, equally negative the existence of a general usage, operative either at law or in equity. How, then, can it be that there is a lien upon the goods of a third person for the charter freight? They do not owe it by contract. The shipper, or the consignee, is not liable for it. Equity first gave the owner a lien for the freight reserved by bill of *lad- 623 ing, and the law has followed equity. But neither law nor equity have ever gone farther. It follows, that, if the freight be paid beforehand, or the bill be freight free, and this be fairly done, there is no lien at all.

If it be competent to the master, with the assent of the charterer, to receive goods on board, on other terms than those of the charter-party, it will follow that he must be the conclusive judge of the terms. The authority of the master, in this respect, in a foreign port, is the same in the case of a chartered ship as in the case of a ship not chartered. The only difference is, that he must have the assent of the charterer. If it were not so, the ship must, in many cases, return home empty, which would be neither for the interest of the owner and charterer, nor would it promote the general interests of commerce and navigation.

The agreement between the charterer and shippers, in this case, was fairly made with the assent of the master, and for the manifest benefit of the owners. Was it, then, competent for the master to bind the owners by his assent? The authority of the master of a chartered ship, in this respect, is no further restricted by the charter-party than to require the assent of the charterer, and to receive the goods of the charterer himself, only on the terms of the charter-party. In the event, then, of the failure, in whole or in part, by the charterer, is it not competent for him to fill up the ship? The only limitation is where goods are put on board, under or in pursuance of the charter-party; or where the conduct of the 624* master is collusive and fraudulent, and intended to injure his owner. The express contract, then, was that the goods should be free of freight; and there can be no implied, where there is an express contract.

If there was no freight due by contract, express or implied, for the carriage of these goods, it follows, from the principles already stated, that there could be no lien. It follows, also, from another principle. There can be no lien created or continued without a rightful possession. The possession acquired by the agreement, if held in violation of the agreement, would thereby become a tortious possession.

Could any action be maintained against the consignee for the carriage of these goods? It is well settled, that where freight is due for the carriage of goods, the consignee to whom they are delivered, impliedly contracts to pay the freight, and assumpsit may be maintained against him.<sup>1</sup> But here no action could be maintained upon the charter-party, for he is no party to it; nor on the bill of lading, for it stipulates that no freight is to be paid; nor on the implied assumpsit, for there is none.

The case is thus reduced to a single point, and that is, whether the goods in question were the property of Chambers, so that they could not be carried in the ship on any other terms than that of paying the charter freight. Wherever the interest of a third person intervenes, and is connected with the power of control, the master has a discretion, and 625* may trol or reject. If he accepts, he is bound, and so is the owner, as against such third persons, by the terms he agrees to. Suppose the charterer's goods to be pledged in a foreign port, and the pawnee (the charterer being unable to redeem) to refuse to ship under the charter-party, or unless he has priority; or suppose them to be attached, or arrested by a creditor; the master has an election, and the owner must abide by the decision.

But it is unnecessary to discuss this question further; for it is plain that the property, before the shipment, at the time of the shipment, and upon the arrival of the vessel, was, and continued to be, the property of the plaintiffs below. Admit that the surplus, in case of sale, would belong to Chambers, and the plaintiffs were only mortgagees; still, as mortgagees, in possession, they are owners, and Chambers had only an equity of redemption. Nor does a mere interest in the profit and loss make any difference;<sup>2</sup> nor that they were shipped for account and risk of Chambers.<sup>3</sup>

Mr. Webster, for the plaintiffs in error, in reply, stated that it was not contended that these particular goods were bound for all the freight of the ship; but considering them as the goods of Messrs. Palmer & Co., the claim was for a pro rata freight only. It is clear, by the charter-party, that the ship-owners [626 retained possession of the ship, so as to have a lien for the freight; and that this lien was also expressly reserved by the terms of that instrument. It is equally clear that this lien extends to all sub-shippers or strangers. There is no difference as to the validity and strength of this lien, whether it is on the goods of a charterer, or on those of other shippers, although there may be as to its extent; the goods of other shippers being liable for the freight stipulated by them, and the charterer's goods being liable for the whole amount of the charter freight. Have the ship-owners, then, waived the lien which is thus secured to them by the general law, and by this particular contract? If they have done so, it is by some act subsequent to the charter-party. All that is relied on, is what the master did at Calcutta. But supposing the goods to be Palmer's, could the master bind the owners by this agreement? We contend he could not, because he was limited by the express terms of the charter-party, which provided that freight should be paid at Philadelphia before the delivery of the cargo. The contract was, that whatever goods were brought should not be delivered till freight was paid. The shippers, and the master, were cognizant of this contract. This provision was a direct limitation of the master's power. He was as much bound by it as by any other part of the charter-party. It is said, that if the master may take goods for diminished freight, the same reason authorizes him to take goods for no freight. But it is very obvious that a freight diminished by circumstances, [627 may still be just and reasonable; whilst a contract to carry goods without any freight cannot be so under any circumstances whatever. It necessarily supposes that freight is paid to the charterer in some other way, to the prejudice of the owners' rights; since it is absurd to suppose an agreement to carry goods without any compensation. If the charterer might take part of a cargo in this way, he might take the whole, and then what becomes of the owners' rights? Of what use, in such a case, would be the covenant to load the ship? The shippers here assist the charterer in an attempt to break his contract with the owners, by which he had stipulated that the goods should be holden for freight. The master cannot, where there is a charter-party, vary the rights and duties of the owner by the bill of lading. If he cannot vary the contract in favor of the charterer, neither can he in favor of anybody else. If goods be brought with the assent of the owner, though there be no contract, and not even a knowledge of the master, the lien attaches. Nobody was authorized under the charter-party to receive the owners' freight before it was earned, or elsewhere than in Philadelphia.

We contend, then, that the owners' lien is not lost by the agreement made at Calcutta with the assent of the master. (1) Because it is, in effect, an agreement made between the shippers and charter, to violate the charter-party, to which the master was not competent to assent. [*628*] sent. (2) Because *the general authority of the master, as agent of the owners, was limited by the charter-party. The shippers knew of this limitation, and could not, consequently, derive any right under an agreement made with him, beyond the scope of his authority. (3) There is no ground here for saying that the master was acting independent of the charter-party, as setting up a general ship; nor could he do this, under the circumstances of the case.

But the true view is, that these goods were the goods of Chambers, the charterer, as between him and the ship-owners. They were purchased and shipped by him, and for his account. They were at his risk in transitu. There is no document showing any interest whatever in Palmer & Co. But there was a parol agreement, that the goods should go consigned to the Messrs. Willings, and that the latter should hold them against the bills drawn by Chambers. The legal property was either in Chambers, or the Willings. The general residuary property was in Chambers; a pledge or lien only existed in favor of Palmer. If there was a loss, Chambers was to bear it; if a gain, it was to be his. If the goods have been sold for more than Palmer's debt, Chambers is entitled to the balance. Before the plaintiffs recover back this money, ought they not to show that the goods, paying freight, do not leave them enough to pay their debt? The lien claimed by them may exist, and yet, in commercial law, the goods may be the property of Chambers. It is so in the contract of insurance; else no [*629*] man *would ever insure goods liable to freight, or commissions, or duties, or any other species of lien.

No goods are brought across the seas without being subject to liens of various sorts; some arising from express contracts, others from the operation of general principles. No one could own goods, if the ownership implied an absence of all liens. Therefore, in the commercial world, he is esteemed owner, for whose account, and at whose risk, they come. Chambers had a clear insurable interest in those goods to the whole amount of their value, whatever that might be. Palmer had an insurable interest only to the amount of the bills of exchange. The plaintiffs' claim rests on the operation of the bill of lading; but that very bill of lading says that the goods are shipped on account and risk of Chambers. This circumstance alone is conclusive. It would be so in the law of prize. The consignee would not be allowed to show an interest by a lien for advances.<sup>1</sup> But Palmer's interest was contingent; he was to have no proprietary interest in the goods, until failure of the acceptance of the bills of exchange, or equivalent security; i. e., until after the arrival of the goods. Whatever the words are, that is the legal effect. Now, it has been repeatedly determined in this court that where goods are sent to a vendee, to be received at his option, or conditionally, they are the goods of the vendor until that option be expressed, or *that condition happen.<sup>2</sup> [*630*] So, if goods be shipped, to be sold on joint account of the shipper and consignee, or the latter alone, at his option, the property is not vested until the election is made.<sup>3</sup>

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a writ of error from the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania, on a judgment, in which the defendants in this court were plaintiffs in the inferior court. The suit instituted in that court, was for the recovery of a sum of money paid under the following circumstances:

The Gracies, being owners of the ship America, chartered her to one Chambers, on a voyage to India. Chambers accompanied the vessel, and, at Calcutta, put her up as a general ship, with notice, however, of his being charterer, not owner. Finding it difficult there to obtain freight, he entered into an arrangement with Palmer, in pursuance of which, the latter supplied him with a quantity of goods, to the value of £8,000, upon the following stipulations: "That Chambers should draw bills, in favor of Palmer & Co., upon his correspondent in Philadelphia, and that the goods should be consigned to the Willings, correspondents of Palmer, in the same place; to whom they should be delivered, freight free, in pledge for the due payment of Chambers' bills."

When the goods were laden on board the America, *the ship-master signed bills [*631*] of lading, stating them to be shipped on account and risk of Chambers, to be delivered to the Messrs. Willings, of Philadelphia. And in that part of the bill of lading in which the freight is usually specified, are inserted these words: "Freight for the said goods having been settled here." Indorsed on the bill of lading are the marks and numbers of the several packages, and on its face are written these words: "Marks and numbers on the back of this bill, countersigned. Hugh Chambers." This is the indorsement noticed in the stated case. A charter-party, with all the usual covenants and formalities, was entered into by the parties, in which the owner undertakes to furnish and navigate the ship, and the charterer to pay the sum of $32,000 for the use of her, with certain specific reservations not material to the decision of any of the questions raised in argument. The clause which stipulates for the payment of the compensation is in these words: "The said charterer covenants," &c., "that he will pay to the owners, on the return of the said ship to Philadelphia, and before the discharge of her cargo there, in approved notes," &c., the sum stipulated for.

The case stated affirms that the whole transaction in Calcutta was effected in good faith; that it was done with the knowledge and assent of the ship-master, and was, under all circumstances, "the best he could do for the interest of the owners of the ship."

The bill of lading was inclosed to the Willings, *with information of the arrangement between Palmer and Chambers; and the drawees of Chambers' bill, having refused to accept them, the Willings demanded the delivery of the goods, freight free. The Gracies refused to deliver the goods, insisting on their right to the freight usually paid on such goods from India, whether they were the property of Palmer, or of Chambers. And in order to get possession of the goods, the freight was accordingly advanced by the Willings, and this action brought to recover it back.

The cause was decided in the court below upon a case stated, in nature of a special verdict, which finds alternatively for the one or the other party, according to the law of the case. The judgment of the Circuit Court was in favor of the defendants.

Much of the argument below appears to have turned upon the general rights and liabilities of owner and charterer under the contract of affreightment; but the learned and elaborate argument of the presiding judge in the court below, has relieved this court from much discussion on that part of the subject. The doctrine, as laid down there, and as stated by the counsel here, exhibits no material shades of distinction. It is, in fact, the common law doctrine of bailment, and common carriers, applied to transportation on the ocean.

The carrier may hire his vehicle, or his team, or his servant, for the purposes of transportation; or he may undertake to employ them himself in the act of transporting the goods of 633* another. It is *in the latter case only that he assumes the liabilities, and acquires the rights of a common carrier. So the ship-owner, who let his ship to hire to another, whether manned and equipped or not, enters into a contract totally distinct from that of him who engages to employ her himself in the transportation of the goods of another. In the former case, he parts with the possession to another, and that other becomes the carrier; in the latter, he retains the possession of the ship, although the hold may be the property of the charterer; and being subject to the liabilities, he retains the rights incident to the character of a common carrier.

On examining the cases in which this subject has engaged the attention of courts of justice, it will be found that the great difficulty generally has been to decide in which of these two relations the ship-owner had placed himself, under the particular stipulations of the charter-party; and how far he has put it in the power of the charterer to defeat his acknowledged right to a lien for the freight. The present case suggests the additional question, how far it lies in the power of the ship-master to defeat this lien, or otherwise sanction a departure from the letter of the charter-party.

The cause has been argued as one vitally important to the commercial world; and very strong views have been presented of the injuries that might be sustained by foreign shippers on the one hand, and by ship-owners on the other, as the one or the other alternative of the 634* stated case *shall obtain the sanction of this court. But it is obvious that most, if not all of these suggestions, have been the offspring of a zealous, rather than a calm survey of possible consequences.

The contract of affreightment, like every other contract, is the creature of the will of the contracting parties. It may be varied to infinity, and easily adapted to the exigencies of either party, or of any trade. It is only where the express contract is silent, that the implied contract can arise. It is possible that a captain and a charterer might connive at a fraud, and pass a chartered vessel upon foreigners as an unchartered vessel; but it is not very probable, and would be extremely difficult. Yet it is not easy to conceive any other case in which a foreign affreighter can be exposed to imposition, while it is always in his power to inspect the charter-party, and determine, from its stipulations, how far he may venture to ship his goods upon a special contract. The general liability of goods for freight is known to all mercantile men; and a stipulation in a charter-party, "that no goods shall be landed from the vessel until the freight is paid," will always alarm the fears of any prudent shipper.

But this case does not imperiously call for a decision upon the general question. The goods are expressly laden on board as the property of Chambers, "on his account and risk." And the question is not how far his contract may exempt the goods of another from freight, but how far he may encumber his own goods with a lien, which *shall ride over or super- [635 sede their general liability for the freight.

We turn, in the first place, to the express contract of the parties, to afford a solution of the question. But there we find that the charterer cannot, without an express violation of his contract, deliver to the consignee a single article, not only until its own peculiar freight be paid, but until the payment of the sum of $32,000, the whole of the freight reserved to the owner.

On what principles rests the general lien of goods for freight? The master is the agent of the ship-owner, to receive and transport; the goods are improved in value, by the costs and cares of transportation. As the bailee of the shipper, the goods are in the custody and possession of the master and ship-owner, and the law will not suffer that possession to be violated, until the laborer has received his hire. But this is literally the effect of that provision in the charter-party which deprives the charterer of the right of landing the cargo until the stipulated hire be paid; or rather, it would seem to go beyond it, and impose a liability beyond what the common law exacts. It may, therefore, be fairly construed into a stipulation, that the charterer should, under no circumstances, dispense with the legal lien of the ship-owner.

The question, then, is, who has trusted this charterer? for he that trusts must pay.

That the ship-owner would not confide in the charterer to land his goods without buying off his right to detain, is expressly proved by the contract. *That contract was ac- [636 cessible to the foreign shipper, and ought to have been looked into to determine the extent of the power vested in the charterer. Whether he neglected this precaution, or contracted with the charterer knowing of this restriction on his power to contract, he is the party that trusts.

The charterer has contracted with the shipper to do an act, which he could not perform without violating his own contract to the ship-owner, and must therefore be considered as having entered into a contract, subordinate in its nature to that previously existing between the owner and charterer. And as the undertaking of the charterer to Palmer could only be performed upon first complying with his undertakings to the owner, he must be considered as having rested on the personal responsibility of the charterer for the removal of that obstacle.

That, in ordinary cases of the hypothecation of goods, the lien for freight would take precedence, cannot be questioned; and in a late adjudication, on a case strikingly similar to the present, and in the courts of a nation which thoroughly understands the laws and interests of commerce (Faith v. The East India Company, 4 Barnw. & Ald., 630), it has been held that goods so circumstanced were bound to the whole extent of the liability of the charterer to the ship-owner for freight. In the present instance, a pro rata freight only is demanded. In the same case, it was further decided that the ship-owner retained his lien for freight on 637* goods shipped by third *persons, even after the drawing of freight-bills in favor of another, by previous agreement.

But it is contended that the case where goods are shipped freight free, or the freight has been actually paid, remains undecided; that the lien for freight attaches only where freight was actually due, but in neither of those cases (that of payment or redemption) could it be predicated of freight that it was due.

Had the reasoning of the judges in the case of Faith v. The East India Company been followed out to its unavoidable consequences, it would seem that no doubt should have been expressed by them upon such a case. For, if the ground of that decision was that the ship-owner was not bound to deliver the goods until his freight was paid, it would seem to be immaterial whether it had been previously paid to the charterer, or to any other not authorized to receive it on account of the owner. But whatever might be the opinion of this court upon a cause so circumstanced, it is obvious that this is not a case of that nature.

These goods were not shipped freight free, nor was the freight actually paid upon them. The words upon the bill of lading are, "freight settled here." And their ambiguity being explained by other parts of the case stated, there is made out a case, in which the freight was no farther settled than by the arrangement made with Palmer, for the purpose of postponing the freight to the defendants' lien for advances of money, or the payment of bills. The compensation for carriage, although disguised under the form of possible profits upon the sales of the goods shipped, still existed; for freight is one of the charges which the consumer pays. It is, then, only an evasion of the rights of the owner, and presents a facility to evasion which ought not to be encouraged. If it be said that the payment of freight was, nevertheless, contingent and uncertain, the reply still is, that this is a subject for consideration between the charterer and the shipper, and could not be sanctioned as the means of evading the express provision in the charter-party against the right of delivery before the payment of freight. Although no freight had been due to the charterer, there was unquestionably a large sum due the owner; and by the terms of his agreement, literally construed, he was not bound to open the hatches until the whole sum was paid. This, however, is more than is contended for upon the plaintiffs' construction of the contract; and more, unquestionably, than would have been sustained as against other shippers; it is not, in this instance, insisted upon as against the charterer himself. But, in fact, this memorandum of the captain on the subject of freight is altogether an immaterial circumstance in a bill of lading made to the charter himself. With whom was he at liberty to settle the freight upon his own shipments, to the prejudice of the ship-owner?

And this leads to the consideration of the last point made in argument for the defendants, to wit, that the acts of the captain bound the ship-owner to a compliance with the stipulations made to the *defendants, Palmer [639 & Co., to the prejudice of the lien insisted on by the present plaintiffs; that is, that either the captain alone, or the captain and charterer together, could divest the owner both of his implied and express right to detain these goods.

Whence is such a power to be deduced? Not from the charterer's rights in the ship, nor from the master's power over the ship; but it is supposed to result from the necessity of the case, the nature of the interest acquired by the charterer, and the general powers of a ship-master, as incident to the duties which he is called upon to perform.

But it is perfectly clear that it is not in the power of the master to release the charterer from his contract to the owner. It is only when the contract is at an end by misfortune, or by the acts of the charterer, that he is called to the exercise of that latitude of power over the ship, which may lead to a resumption of the right to lade her for the benefit of all concerned. In the meantime, he has no power to modify the contract entered into with his owner; since all the power delegated to him, while the charter-party continues to operate, is to perform the undertakings of his employer in the fulfillment of the contract. When abandoned by his charterer, he is of necessity cast upon himself to do the best he can for all concerned; and whether that be to return empty, or to take in such freight as may offer, he is still acting under his original relations with his owner; for if not actually carrying into effect the *stipulations of the charter-party, his general duty is to do nothing that can release the charterer from his liability under it. This is altogether inconsistent with the idea of his being authorized to modify or dispense with the terms of the charter-party.

So far as the interests of the charterer may be affected by the want of power to modify contracts for freight, in any manner that exigencies may require, it has been before observed that this should have been attended to in making his contract with the owner. And as it is very certain that a release from the ordinary security of the carrier must have been purchased by an enhanced price or personal security, so it would be highly unjust to subject the owners to a loss of their ordinary security, without compensation in price, or extraordinary security as the substitute. As to the interests of ship-owners themselves, it is enough, for the present case, to say, "let them judge for themselves."

But there is very great reason to think that the acts of the master, in this case, have had views and effects attributed to them, directly the reverse of his intention and understanding in performing those acts. It is observed by one of the judges, in the decision before alluded to, "that had the captain done his duty, he never would have taken goods on board on which the owner would have no lien." It is right that a construction should be given to the conduct of the master, which may comport both with a knowledge and a due observance of his duty. And in this view of the case, 641* notwithstanding his privity to the arrangement between the charterer and shipper, as he was himself called upon to do no act that could deprive his owner of his lien, he might well have considered the stipulation between the charterer and shipper as a matter inter alios; in pursuance of which his employer could sustain no loss, however the charterer might render himself liable to the shipper for consequences. Such was certainly not the understanding of the shipper as to the effect of his contract with the charterer, but he might have been better informed by studying the charter-party; and, non constat, if the captain had been required to sign a bill of lading to the shipper, with an express stipulation that the goods should be free from liability to his owner, that he would have been betrayed into such a breach of duty, or assumption of power. He might well have supposed that in signing this bill of lading to Chambers, and not to Palmer, he was doing no act that could impair the rights and interests of his employer.

We are therefore of opinion that there is error in the judgment of the Circuit Court; that it must be reversed, and a mandate issue to enter judgment for the defendants below, agreeably to the case stated.

[*PRACTICE. PLEADING. JURISDICTION.]

ANDERSON CHILDRESS, Executor of JOEL CHILDRESS, Plaintiff in Error,

v.

EMORY AND M'CLEUR, Executors of
JOHN G. COMEGYS, surviving partner of WILLIAM COCHRAN & COMEGYS, Defendants in Error.

The courts of the United States have jurisdiction of suits by or against executors and administrators, if they are citizens of different states, &c., although their testators or intestates might not have been entitled to sue, or liable to be sued in those courts.

It is, in general, not necessary, in deriving title to a bill or note, through the indorsement of a partnership firm, or from the surviving partner, through the act of the law, to state particularly the names of the persons composing the firm.

A declaration, averring that "J. C., by his agent, A. C., made" the note, &c., is good.

A general profert of letters testamentary is sufficient, and if the defendant would object to their insufficiency, he must crave oyer; or if it be alleged that the plaintiffs are not executors, the objection must be taken by plea in abatement.

Debt, against an executor, should be in the detinet only, unless he has made himself personally responsible, as by a devastavit.

An action of debt lies, upon a promissory note, against executors.

The wager of law, if it ever had a legal existence in the United States, is now completely abolished.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Tennessee.

The defendants in error, citizens of the state of Maryland, and executors of John G. Comegys, the surviving partner of the late firm of "William Cochran & Comegys," brought an action of debt in the detinet, on a promissory note, executed by *the said Anderson [643 Childress, as the agent of said Joel Childress; both of whom are citizens of the state of Tennessee. The declaration stated the plaintiffs in said suit (now defendants in error), to be the executors of the last will and testament of John G. Comegys, deceased, who was the surviving partner of the late firm of William Cochran & Comegys; that on the first of May, 1817, the said Joel Childress, by his agent, A. Childress, made his promissory note to the firm of William Cochran & Comegys, and thereby promised to pay to William Cochran & Comegys, or order, the sum of $1,897.28, for value received. That the said Joel, in his life-time, did not pay the said firm of William Cochran & Comegys, nor did he pay the said John G. Comegys, surviving partner of said late firm of William Cochran & Comegys, the said sum of money, or any part thereof, nor has he paid the same, or any part thereof to the said plaintiffs, executors as aforesaid, nor hath the said Anderson Childress's executors as aforesaid, paid the said sum, or any part thereof, to the late firm of William Cochran & Comegys, nor to John G. Comegys, surviving partner of the said firm, nor hath he paid the said sum, or any part thereof, unto the said plaintiffs, executors aforesaid, but so to do hath wholly refused, and still doth, to the damage of said plaintiffs $500; and therefore they sue, and they bring here into court the letters testamentary, by which it will appear they are qualified, &c.

To this declaration, the defendant, now plaintiff *in error, demurred, and as- [644 signed for demurrer the following causes:

1st. That said declaration alleges that said note was made to a late firm of William Cochran & Comegys, and that the plaintiffs are executors of the surviving partner of that firm; but whom said partner survived, or who comprised that firm, does not appear.

2d. That an action of debt cannot be maintained against the defendant (now plaintiff in error), as executor upon a promissory note.

3d. That it is not alleged that said pretended promissory note was signed by said Joel Childress, or the defendant.

4th. That the declaration omits to state any damages.

5th. There is no sufficient proof of any letters testamentary, to show the right of said plaintiffs to maintain this suit.

Joinder in demurrer. After argument, the court overruled all the said causes of demurrer, and gave judgment, that the plaintiffs do recover the sum of $1,897.28, debt, together with $360.47 for their damages, sustained by reason of the detention thereof, as also their costs, to be levied of the goods and chattels of Joel Childress, deceased, in the possession of said Anderson Childress; and on default thereof, the costs to be levied of the proper goods of said defendant.

Mr. Webster, for the plaintiff in error, argued, 1. That the action was misconceived, 645* debt not being an appropriate remedy against an executor or administrator, on a simple contract. He conceived it unnecessary to inquire into the origin of this rule, or the principle which sustained it, as it rested on the clearest authorities of the English law, and had become an established doctrine, from which this court would not be inclined to depart; as it was of more consequence that the law should be certain and fixed, than that plaintiffs should be allowed a choice of remedies. Because the reason, on which a remedy may have been originally given or refused by the law, may have ceased, it does not, therefore, follow that the established rules of practice and pleading are to be altered. The wager of law has ceased, but many rules of practice and pleading, founded upon it, have survived, and have become rules of property, which cannot be now safely disturbed. The statute of limitations may or may not apply, according to the form of the action, and the party has a right to the benefit of the distinction. On the English law it is clear that debt cannot be maintained in this case, as the testator might have waged his law, which none can do who defend in a representative character; hence it is that, in the case of simple contracts, debt has been superseded by the action of assumpsit, in which, as the testator could not have waged his law, his executor is not deprived of any defense which might have been used by the testator.<sup>1</sup>

646* *2. The next cause of demurrer, in this case, is the want of certainty in the declaration, which states the note to have been made to a late firm of "William Cochran & Comegys," and that the plaintiffs are executors of the surviving partner of that firm; but of whom that firm was composed, or whom the said partner survived, do not appear. It cannot be inferred that the firm of William Cochran & Comegys was composed of William Cochran and John G. Comegys, nor that the latter survived the former, and is the Comegys alluded to in the firm, and in the note in controversy. These are matters which should have been stated with sufficient certainty and not have been left to mere conjecture.<sup>2</sup>

3. This declaration is defective, also, in not stating that the note was either signed by Joel Childress, or by Anderson Childress, or by him as the lawfully authorized agent of Joel.

4. There is no sufficient proof of any letters testamentary, evincing the right of the defendants in error to maintain this suit. The authority whence they emanated does not appear. An executor must show by whom his letters were granted; and here it does not appear whether they were granted in Maryland, or in the state of Tennessee.<sup>3</sup>

5. The declaration states the defendants in error to be citizens of the state of Maryland, and the plaintiff in error to be a citizen of the state of Tennessee; but it is not stated 647 that the testators of either party were citizens of different states; non constat, but they were all citizens of the state of Tennessee.<sup>4</sup> The case, therefore, may be considered as falling within the provisions of the judiciary act of 1789, ch. 20.

Mr. D. Hoffman, contra, argued that the action of debt was an appropriate remedy on a promissory note, against the personal representatives of the maker or indorser of such note. The reason assigned in England for denying this remedy against an executor or administrator, does not apply even in that country to the case of a promissory note, which is not that species of simple contract to which the books allude, when speaking of the trial by wager of law.

The question is altogether new, even in that country whence we are to derive our law on this obsolete subject; and has never received a judicial discussion or determination in this country. Some research, therefore, into this ancient subject, will be essential to its due determination. It is said that debt will not lie against an executor, on the simple contract debt of his testator; and, in England, this, as a general proposition, is undoubtedly true. Still, however, it can, with no propriety, be compared to a rule of property, which, though now, in many instances arbitrary and unmeaning, must be maintained as long possessions, valuable estates, and the firmest titles may be dependent on it. But whether a 648 creditor by simple contract resorts to the one remedy or the other, is of no consequence to anyone but himself. This election of remedy, then, will not be denied, unless for an adequate reason. This court is under no necessity to sanction an unmeaning dictum of English law, at all times absurd, and at no period either approved by the lawyers of the times, or settled on any fixed principle. No reason has ever been assigned for exempting executors from responsibility on this remedy, except the one, that as none who defend jure representationis, can wage their law, and as the testator, in debt on simple contract, had this privilege, the executor shall not be thus sued. But it will be endeavored to be shown that this was originally a gross perversion of reason; that the rule should have been either the reverse, or that, in order to preserve anything like consistency in the law, executors and administrators ought never to have been responsible, in any form of action, for the simple contracts of those whom they represent.

The inquiry then will be, (1) Whether the testator was ever permitted, even in England, to wage his law, in debt on a promissory note. (2) If he were allowed, whether this antiquated doctrine of the common law is proper to be adopted as a part of our jurisprudence. (3) Whether in law, or in practice, it ever has been recognized or used, in the state of Tennessee, or elsewhere in this country.

1. On examining the history and progress of 649* this singular species of trial, it will be found to have been uniformly applied to the evidence of the demand, and was in no case an incident to the nature of the action or remedy. Whenever the debt or demand was sufficiently evidenced; whenever it was notorious in its nature, or defined in its extent; or finally, whenever it did not rest merely in verbis, there wager of law did not obtain. We may then inquire, first, in what cases wager of law was not allowed by the common law: and, second, in what description of cases it was permitted; and, from an examination of the reasons which sustained or repudiated wager of law in these cases, we shall find that, in principle, it never could have been applied to the case of a promissory note, and that, in fact, it never has been so applied.

First, then, wager of law was not allowed in the following cases: (1) In an action of debt on any specialty; for here, as Plowden observes, a debt is contracted by three distinct acts of solemn consent, signing, sealing, and delivery of the instrument; each act strengthens the evidence of consideration, and adds force and efficacy to the demand. It would not be proper, therefore, that a mere act in pais, or the oath of the party, should render that inoperative which has been guarded by so many acts of deliberation. The maxim in such case being unumquod que dissolvitur eo modo quo colligatur. (2) In debt on any record, there can be no wager of law for similar reasons. The debt has become notorious and certain; the record brought it into existence, and, at law, 650* the record should ordinarily declare its annihilation. (3) In an action of debt for rent, even on a parol lease, the defendant is not permitted to wage his law, because, as it is said, the demand savours of the realty, which, in fact, means that the claim arises from the defendant's preception of the profits of the land; that his occupation is notorious his entry into the land was, perhaps, coram paribus curiæ, and if not, that the notoriety of his occupation should, on the principle I have stated, oust the wager of law. (4) So, in an action of account, where the receipts have been by the hands of a third person, and not from the plaintiff himself, wager of law will not lie; and the reason assigned is, that this third person may well be supposed competent to prove the receipts, and this supposition, per se, is sufficient to exclude the wager of law. (5) In debt by a goaler against his prisoner, or by an innkeeper against his guest, for board, &c., the defendant cannot resort to this mode of trial; and the principle which excludes it in these cases, is essentially the same, viz., the presumed notoriety of the demand. Prisons and inns are quasi publici juris; the prisoner and the guest must be received, and their reception is not a matter of privacy, but is presumed to be provable. Aliter, in the case of a victualler, who serves for matters furnished to his customers; his claim may be defeated by the defendant's oath.<sup>1</sup> (6) Wager of law is not permitted in debt for any *penalty given by statute, for this is a 651 matter in consimili casu with debts by specialty or record. (7) Nor was it allowed against an account settled by auditors, for here the debt becomes susceptible of proof, is rendered certain, and still though a simple contract debt, yet, as it does not rest in verbis merely, it shall not be left to the conscience only of the defendant. (8) Where the claim or demand was in any degree connected with the realty, wager of law would not lie; for the pares curiæ were supposed to be cognizant of such matters. Hence, for example, where the plaintiff leased a room to the defendant, and then took him and his wife to board; in debt, for the boarding, it was held that even this accidental connection of the matter with the realty, was sufficient to rescue it from the operation of the wager of law.<sup>2</sup> (9) So, in debt for wages due for serving under the statute of laborers; as the service is compulsory and notorious, the defendant cannot wage his law. (10) Likewise, in debt by an attorney for his fees, though there be no writing, yet, as he is an officer of the court, his demand cannot be defeated by wager of law.<sup>3</sup> (11) Wager of law is never permitted in the case of contempt, trespass, or deceit, for these, per se, charge the defendant with immoral conduct, which renders his oath suspicious.<sup>4</sup> (12) Nor will it lie in a quo minus, for reasons similar to those already suggested.<sup>5</sup> (13) Nor against 652 any claim founded on prescription, for this is notorious, and susceptible of proof.<sup>6</sup> (14) Lastly, in an action of debt by a merchant stranger, or any species of simple contract, the defendant was not permitted to wage his law. Even in those early times, the courts were strongly disposed to rescue commercial contracts and dealings from this species of trial, as may be seen by the intended operation of the statute de mercatoribus, and particularly in the case of foreign creditors, who, it was presumed, could not so easily obtain the requisite evidence of their claims as resident merchants; and this may be seen in Godfrey and Dixon's case.<sup>7</sup>

From the cases enumerated, it appears that wherever the plaintiff's demand is certain, and is so evidenced as to exclude the idea of a mere secret or verbal contract between the parties, there the defendant could neither deny the contract, nor maintain its discharge by his oath and that of his compurgators.

If we examine the cases in which the defendant has been allowed this mode of trial, we shall find the same principle strongly manifested. The books furnish us with only six classes of cases in which a defendant is permitted to wage his laws. (1) In debt, on simple contract; by which we are not to understand (as I shall presently show) every species of simple contract, but such only which, as the authorities express 653*] themselves, “are *dependent on the slippery memory of man, or the uncertainty of verbal agreements.” (2) In debt on an award, under a parol submission. It has, indeed, been urged that wager of law ought not, on principle, to be permitted in such a case, as the action is grounded on a notorious transaction, and by the interposition of third persons. But it was held that the award is not the ground of action, but the submission, which may be private.<sup>1</sup> (3) In an action of account against a receiver, on receipts from the plaintiff himself, the defendant may wage his law, for here the action itself shows that the matter is private between the parties; and this differs from the case already adverted to, where the receipts were by the hands of third persons. (4) In detinue, where the matter is no way connected with reality, the defendant may wage his law. Here the gist of the action is the detainer. But in detinue for a charter of feoffment, wager of law will not lie, as it concerns the freehold; everything regarding which is presumed to be matter of notoriety.<sup>2</sup> (5) In debt for an amerceament, in a court not of record, it is said by some that the defendant may wage his law. But an enlightened baron of the exchequer says that if this be law, it must be on the ground of the insignificance of the debt, which seldom exceeds 40s., and which can be safely left to 654*] the consciences of men, and ought not *to trouble the country in the trial thereof.<sup>3</sup> Holt, Ch. J., however, is decidedly of opinion that the defendant cannot wage his law in this case; for, says he, “the plaintiff hath now sufficient proof to make out his cause; it hath ceased to be a matter of secrecy, and hence cannot be defeated by the oath of the defendant.” (6) and lastly: In real actions, the defendant may wage his law of non-summons, this being often in secret, and not vouched by any writing.<sup>4</sup>

From the cases enumerated, of the allowance or denial of this mode of trial, it is manifest that it has only been tolerated in a few special cases; and these (to use the language of Holt) “are all grounded on a feeble foundation, or are of small consideration in the law.” They abundantly prove that wager of law originated in the “unstable evidence of the demand,” in the “feebleness and exility of the plaintiff’s cause of action” and that it had no connection whatever with the particular nature of the remedy by which the demand was sought to be enforced.

My position, then, is, that wager of law, in its origin, principle, and practice, never did apply to written, though unsealed evidences of debt; and, a multo fortiori, not to promissory notes. It is conceded, however, that a different opinion has been entertained, and that it has been supposed that the principle which regulates the admission or rejection of wager of law, is the 655*] presence *or absence of a seal, or something equivalent thereto; and that all contracts, not of record, or not under seal, are parol or simple contracts, in reference to this mode of trial. That this opinion is erroneous, has already been partly shown; and, that it is altogether unsound, I shall now endeavor further to illustrate.

As to the origin of this “temper to corrupt perjury,” Lord Coke confidently refers it to the law of God, which permitted the bailee of an ox, or other cattle, to discharge himself, by his own oath, from all responsibility for the death or loss of the animal. Others have regarded it as a mistaken application, by the early ecclesiastics of England, of the decisory oath of the civilians; and some have supposed that it was introduced by them with the oath ex officio, so often used in cases of ecclesiastical cognizance. But whether it be the offspring of Saxon rudeness, or finds its exemplar in the more refined code of imperial Rome, is not very material; certain it is, that the simple contracts alluded to in the books, mean nothing more than such an unsustained or unevidenced contract, as ought, in conscience, to be outweighed by the oath of the party sought to be charged. In the first Edward’s reign, we find that if a creditor sued on a verbal demand, he was required to make rationabilem monstracionem that a debt existed. For this purpose he produced his secta; the defendant might then vadiare legem, that is, wage his law against the plaintiff’s secta. We find, also, that no secta was ever required where the plaintiff could produce any writing; *and as the wager of law was for the [656 purpose of disproving the testimony of the secta, according to the then prevailing maxim. lex vincit sectam, it seems to follow that no wager of law was ever allowed where the plaintiff’s claim was evidenced by any writing. The waging of law, therefore, may be considered as springing from the secta, and was a proof to silence the presumption raised by this preliminary evidence, adduced in support of mere verbal contracts.<sup>5</sup> The secta, and the defendant’s oath, and compurgators, appear to have been requisite only “in respect of the weakness and inconsiderableness of the plaintiff’s evidence of debt.” This view of the subject is strongly shown in the well-known case on this antiquated learning, The City of London v. Wood.<sup>6</sup> In that case, Holt, Ch. J., remarks that wager of law is allowable, not because the debt may be discharged, or paid in private, but because the ground of action is itself secret; for, that if the privacy of payment, or the possibility thereof, were the occasion of wager of law, that might be a reason, in all cases where it is admitted, that this trial will not be allowed. The theory of this subject clearly evinces that wager of law could at no time have been applicable to the species of simple contract now under consideration. Promissory notes surely are entitled to as much respect as a stated account by auditors, against which, we have seen, there could be no wager of *law; and they [657 have all that certainty, notoriety and evidence in their nature, so often alluded to, and which constitute the only basis on which the admission or rejection of this summary proceeding can rest.

If we for a moment inquire into the nature of this species of simple contract, we cannot fail to perceive that it has no one feature in common with those in which the defendant has been permitted to wage his law. Notes and bills are contracts sui generis; they are instruments of a peculiar character, neither specialties, nor parol contracts. They cannot be regarded as mere parol or simple contracts, neither before, nor since the statute 3 and 4 Anne, c. 9., and, consequently, ought not to be embraced within the principle which sustains the wager of law, allowing this to be even broader than has been stated. For, first, even prior to the statute of Anne, the plaintiff need not have averred nor proved any consideration; the mere statement of the promise, and the defendant's liability, constituted a sufficient prima facie evidence of debt. Even between the original parties they imported a consideration; and the onus probandi of the absence, or failure of consideration, lies on the defendant.<sup>1</sup>

The doctrine, then, of Rann v. Hughes,<sup>2</sup> which qualified the obiter opinion of Mr. Justice Wilmot, in Pillans v. Van Meirop, is itself 658* too broad; *for, though the common law has not adopted the well known distinction of the civilians, between contracts ex literis and ex verbis, yet notes and bills are exceptions, firmly ingrafted on the general rule. Second. If, then, these instruments, at all times, imported a prima facie consideration, the statute has clothed them with an additional property. They are no longer mere choses in action; their simple negotiability, though they remain in the hands of the original parties, imparts to them a further dignity which distinguishes them from all other simple contracts; they are originally evidences of debt, and, after indorsement, the statute raises an irresistible presumption in favor of honest holders, a presumptio iuris et de jure.

May we not, then, assert, with confidence, that these instruments, which have sprung into life end utility long after the wager of law had gone into almost desuetude, cannot be those "secret contracts, whose feebleness and exility" should subject them to avoidance by the defendant's oath?

Again, It will be borne in mind, that when wager of law was first practiced, the principle which would not allow an action of debt on simple contract, against an executor, also deprived the creditor of every other remedy. The maxim then applied was actio personalis moritur cum persona. But, after the introduction of the action of assumpsit, it was held by the courts, not only that the debt survived against the personal representatives of the deceased, 659* but the debtor himself *was not permitted to wage his law in this form of action. It is manifest, however, that both of these opinions originated in the mistaken application of the principle which sustained wager of law, viz., to the form of the remedy instead of the evidence of the debt; and that, in truth, there was no legal necessity to resort to such refinements to get rid, either of the maxim or of wager of law.

When case on assumpsit was introduced, promissory notes were scarcely known. Prior to Elizabeth's reign, debt was the only remedy on simple contract. The year books furnish no instance of the action of assumpsit, and Slade's case<sup>3</sup> is the first judicial sanction of this form of action. This was shortly after followed by Pinchon's case,<sup>4</sup> in which assumpsit was enforced against executors, and wager of law was denied to the testator. But in introducing the remedy by assumpsit, it was by no means the design of the courts to abolish the remedy by debt on simple contract. It was an additional remedy, intended to avoid an inconvenient maxim in one case, and a no less inconvenient mode of trial in another. The action of debt, however, remained a suitable remedy in all cases of simple contract, where wager of law would not lie. In the case now under consideration, assumpsit might, indeed, have been brought against the executors of Childress. If, in debt against Childress himself, he *could not [660 have waged his law, why should this remedy be denied against his executors? If the testator had not this privilege, the plaintiff had his election to sue in debt or assumpsit. Of late, debt on simple contract has become a more favorite and practiced remedy. In some respects, it is preferable to assumpsit; for, in debt, the judgment is final, and not interlocutory, as in assumpsit. The defendant, also, in some cases, is compellable to find bail in error, though the judgment be by nil dicit, or on demurrer.<sup>5</sup> Both in England and this country, debt is brought on notes and bills, wherever the responsibility is not merely collateral;<sup>6</sup> and no reason can be assigned for refusing it in the present case, except the one I have endeavored to show was never applicable to this species of simple contract. It is material to be recollected, that wager of law was not at any time a well fixed or established privilege. In the reign of Edward III. the courts very consistently held, that where a testator might wage his law, his executors might also.<sup>7</sup> The grounds of its application were always, in a degree, uncertain; and its admission or rejection, was under the sound discretion of the court. Wager of law, says Ch. Baron Ward, is a matter ex gratia curiæ. Judges are to use a sort of discretion in admitting people to it.<sup>8</sup>

ored to refute. But ought this case to outweigh those which have been advanced in support of a contrary opinion? It is a solitary case, standing amidst the accumulated decisions of centuries. From the days of Elizabeth to the year 1805, and since, no case can be found in which wager of law has been applied to the case of a promissory note, though debt has been frequently brought on notes and bills. The point now under consideration passed sub silentio in the case of Barry v. Robinson; it was not adverted to, either in the argument at the bar, or by the court. Had the question been made, and the mind of the court been expressly directed to the distinction between these evidences of debt and other simple contracts, the decision must have been different. In that case, perhaps, there was no objection to resort to another form of action; but in the circumstances of the present case, if this action cannot be sustained, it will be of little avail to prosecute in another form. Sir James Mansfield, in that case, rested his opinion on the distinction between debt and assumpsit, as applicable to the case of executors; but no inquiry was made as to the nature of the 662*] proof to sustain *the action. He admitted that the distinction was not founded in good sense, but denied his power to alter the law. I have endeavored to show that the law needed no alteration, as this summary mode of trial was not applicable, and never had been applied to such substantial evidences of debt as notes and bills.

2. But even supposing that, by the common law of England, the testator could have waged his law in this case, is it proper that this antiquated doctrine should be adopted as a part of our jurisprudence? The wager of battle, and the various other barbarous modes of trial invented by a superstitious age, are equally portions of the common law; yet all will allow that they are wholly at variance with the genius and spirit of our institutions, and are not fit to be incorporated with our jurisprudence. At one time the plaintiff was obliged to produce his secta; and though our declarations still conclude with an inde producit sectam, in compliance with the fashion of former times, yet an attempt at this day, practically to revive this preliminary proof, would, no doubt, be regarded as the result of a most adventurous and indiscriminate admiration of the common law.

3. The wager of law has never been adopted in this country. The reported adjudications of this country do not allude to the distinction between debt and assumpsit on simple contracts, nor is wager of law once mentioned in any of them. The statutes of the various states are 663*] equally *silent, with the exception of New Jersey<sup>1</sup> and South Carolina.<sup>2</sup> In the former state, wager of law is abolished in all cases except of non-summons in real actions; and in South Carolina, wager of law is abolished in the action of detinue. This provision, no doubt, was ex abundanti cautela. Detinue is there a practiced remedy for the recovery of slaves, being preferable to replevin or trover. As slaves are not connected with the realty, so as to oust the wager of law, if it otherwise obtained, it might have been supposed that this mode of trial would be attempted in detinue for slaves, and to remove this possibility the statute was enacted, for there is no instance of its adoption in this, or any other action; nor does the present record furnish any reason for supposing that it is known to the law or practice of the courts of Tennessee. It is also proper to remark that promissory notes, in the state of Tennessee, rest on precisely the same principles as in England; and the statute of Anne is there in force. Wager of law is a mode of trial hostile to the liberal spirit of our laws. By this trial the defendant becomes not only a witness in his own cause, but the only witness: and one, too, who cannot be contradicted either by proofs or circumstances. The judgment thereon is final; more conclusive than a verdict; for, when the defendant is sworn de fidelitate, and his eleven compurgators de credulitate, *all contro- [664 versy is terminated. There could be no new trial, for any cause whatever.<sup>3</sup> If ever so flagrantly abused by perjury, there can be no remedy; for it was a well-established maxim that "indictment for perjury lies not for false swearing in the trial by wager of law."<sup>4</sup> The mock solemnity in the manner of waging law would ill suit the simplicity of judicial proceedings in this enlightened age and country.<sup>5</sup> Trial by jury is the only mode of trial known to our common law jurisprudence. The judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 34, provides that the laws of the several states shall be rules of decision on all trials at common law, except where the laws of the United States shall otherwise require. The constitution expressly guaranties trial by jury in all common law cases, where the amount exceeds twenty dollars. And though the phraseology of this article of the constitution seems to aim at the preservation of that which was before the admitted mode of trial, yet there can be no doubt that it was a primary object to abolish all summary trials, all barbarous and unsuitable modes of judicial investigation.

The other causes of demurrer may be more briefly examined. It is clear, from the declaration, that the firm of William Cochran & Comegys was composed of but two persons, viz., William Cochran & Comegys. The declaration alleges that John G. Comegys was the surviving partner of this firm, and this is equivalent to an *express averment that the [665 Comegys of the firm, and John G. Comegys, who survived, are the same persons; that the firm was composed of none else, and that John G. Comegys survived William Cochran. The forms of declaring or pleading do not require that every possible inference should be negatived. All that is required, is "certainty to a common intent," or at most, "certainty to a certain intent in general;" by which is meant, what, upon a fair and reasonable construction may be called certain, without recurring to possible facts which do not appear.<sup>6</sup> This species of certainty is sufficient in all declarations, replications, and even indictments. If there be sufficient certainty to enable the de-defendant to answer, the jury to decide, and the court to render judgment, it is well, though the nicety of critics may not be gratified. It is said, that a more rigid certainty is sometimes required, but this is doubtful; and if not, it obtains only in two cases, viz., in pleas of estoppel, and alien enemy, which are not favored, and are, therefore, said to demand a certainty to "a certain intent in every particular."<sup>1</sup> On inspecting this declaration, could a reasonable doubt be entertained by the defendant below, the court or jury, that this firm was composed of any but the two persons mentioned, and that John G. Comegys is the person alluded to in the firm, and in the note, and that he survived William Cochran?

The next objection to the declaration regards 666* the mode in which Joel Childress is alleged to have made this note. But it would not have been proper to have stated that the note was signed by Joel Childress, for this was not the fact; nor that it was made by A. Childress, for the debt was not his, but Joel's. The declaration might have stated that the note was made by Joel, without noting the agency, for this is its legal operation. But the allegation in this case is according to the fact, viz., that "the said Joel Childress, by his agent, A. Childress, made," &c., and this is the safest and usual mode. Whether A. Childress were the lawfully authorized agent of Joel, is matter of proof, not of pleading.<sup>2</sup>

It is also objected, that there is no sufficient profert of the letters testamentary; and that it does not appear from what authority they emanated. The omission of profert is, no doubt, cause of special demurrer; but, where profert is made, its sufficiency is matter of evidence only, and a demurrer to it, as evidence, would lie. But the demurrer in this case, is not for the omission, nor for defectively making the profert, nor does it appear in the shape of a demurrer to evidence, complaining of the insufficiency of the authority granting the letters. But were this the case, non constat from this record, by whom they were granted, which surely was the fault of the plaintiff in error, not of the defendant; how the court below was to have judged this matter, or how this court 667* can judge of the sufficiency of the letters, for they do not appear to have been legally before the court below, and they are not before this in any form. This was the fault of the defendant below. After the profert, he should have cravedoyer, and then demurred.<sup>3</sup>

But this demurrer, I presume, cannot be sustained on any ground; for if the letters proffered were those of the state of Tennessee, the plaintiffs' right to sue will not be questioned; and if the letters were granted in Maryland, the statute of 1809, c. 121, s. 1, 2, of Tennessee, expressly authorizes executors or administrators to sue in the courts of that state, under letters granted by any of the sister states.

The last objection which has been made, is to the jurisdiction of the court, viz., that the declaration only avers the parties to this suit to be citizens of different states, but has not stated their respective testators to be citizens of different states. But this is not a case embraced by the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20. Executors are not assignees, within the letter or spirit of that act; they are something more than assignees; they are representatives, who are not mere instruments, for they have the property of their testator, both legal and equitable, vested in them. They are the absolute owners of the property, as to all strangers; they are the lords of all the contracts made with their testator; they may release, sue, or receive payment on them; and, *until the estate is settled, not even 668 the legatees, or distributees, can interfere with them. This is a case, then, under the constitution; and the controversy is between citizens of different states, not nominally merely, but substantially. It is therefore immaterial to inquire whether their respective testators were citizens of the same, or of different states.<sup>4</sup>

Mr. Justice STORY delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the executors of John G. Comegys, who was surviving partner of the firm of William Cochran & Comegys, to recover the contents of a promissory note, made by Joel Childress, deceased (whose executor the plaintiff in error is), payable to the firm of William Cochran & Comegys. The cause came before the Circuit Court for the District of West Tennessee, upon a special demurrer to the declaration; and the court having overruled the demurrer, it has been brought here by writ of error.

The several causes assigned for special demurrer have been argued at the bar; but before we proceed to the consideration of them, we may as well dispose of the objection taken to the jurisdiction. The parties, executors, are, in the writ and declaration, averred to be citizens of different states; but it is not alleged that their testators were citizens of different states; and the case *has therefore been 669 supposed to be affected by the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20. But that section has never been construed to apply to executors and administrators. They are the real parties in interest before the court, and succeed to all the rights of their testators, by operation of law, and no other persons are the representatives of the personality, capable of suing and being sued. They are contradistinguished, therefore, from assignees, who claim by the act of the parties. The point was expressly adjudged in Chappedelaine v. Dechenaux (4 Cranch's Rep., 306), and, indeed, has not been seriously pressed on the present occasion.

The first cause of demurrer is, that the declaration states the note to have been made to the firm of William Cochran & Comegys, but does not state who in particular the persons composing that firm were. Upon consideration we do not think this objection ought to prevail. The firm are not parties to the suit; and if Comegys was, as the declaration asserts, the surviving partner of the firm, his executor is the sole party entitled to sue. It is not necessary, in general, in deriving a title through the indorsement of a firm, to allege, in particular, who the persons are composing that firm; for, if the indorsement be made in the name of the firm, by a person duly authorized, it gives a complete title, whoever may compose the firm. (See 3 Chitty's Plead., 2, 39.) If this be so, in respect to a derivative title, from the act of the parties, more particularity and certainty do not seem essential in a derivative title by the 670]* act of the law. A more technical averment might, indeed, have been framed upon the rules of good pleading; but the substance is preserved. And there is some convenience in not imposing any unnecessary particularity, since it would add to the proofs; and it is not always easy to ascertain or prove the persons composing firms, whose names are on negotiable instruments, especially where they reside at a distance; and every embarrassment in the proofs would materially diminish the circulation of these valuable facilities of commerce.

Another cause of demurrer is, that the declaration does not aver that the note was signed by Joel Childress. To this it is sufficient to answer that the declaration does state, that "Joel Childress, by his agent, A. Childress, made" the note; and it is not necessary to state that he signed it; it is sufficient if he made it. The note might have been declared on as the note of the principal, according to its legal operation, without noticing the agency; and though it would have been technically more accurate to have averred that the principal, by his agent, in that behalf duly authorized, made the note, yet it is not indispensable; for, if he makes it by his agent, it is a necessary inference of law that the agent is authorized, for otherwise, the note would not be made by the principal; and that the demurrer itself admits. (See Chitty on Bills, Appx. Sect. p. 528, and notes, Id; Bayley on Bills, 103; 2 Phillips' Evid., ch. 1, s. 1, p. 4, 6.)

Another cause of demurrer is, that the declaration 671]* omits to state any damages; but this, if in any respect material in an action of debt, is cured by the writ, which avers an ad damnum of $500.

Another cause of demurrer is, that the letters testamentary are not sufficiently set forth to show the right of the plaintiffs to sue. But profert is made of the letters testamentary, in the usual form; and if the defendant would have objected to them as insufficient, he should have craved oyer, so as to have brought them before the court. Unless oyer be craved and granted, they cannot be judicially examined. And if the plaintiffs were not executors, that objection should have been taken by way of abatement, and does not arise upon a demurrer in bar. It may be added, that, by the laws of Tennessee, executors and administrators, under grants of administration by other states of the Union, are entitled to sue in the courts of Tennessee without such letters granted by the state. (Act of Tennessee, 1809, ch. 121, s. 1, 2.)

It was also suggested at the bar, but not assigned as cause of demurrer, that the action ought not to have been in the detinet only; but in the debet et detinet. This is a mistake. Debt against an executor, in general, should be in the detinet only, unless he has made himself personally responsible, as by devastavit. (Comyn's Dig. Pleader, 2 D., 2, 1 Chitty's Plead., 292, 344; 2 Chitty's Plead., 141, note f; Hope v. Bague, 3 East, 6; 1 Saund. Rep., 1, note 1; 1 Saund., 112, note 1.) And if it had been otherwise, the objection could only have been [*672 taken advantage of on special demurrer, for it is but matter of form, and cured by our statute of jeofails. (Burland v. Tyler, 2 Lord Raym., 1391; 2 Chitty's Pl., 141, note f; Act of 1789, ch. 20, s. 32.)

But the most important objection remains to be considered; and that is, that an action of debt does not lie upon a promissory note against executors. It is argued that debt does not lie upon a simple contract generally against executors; and the case of Barry v. Robinson, in 4 Bos. & Pull., 293, has been cited as directly in point. Certainly, if this be the settled rule of the common law, we are not at liberty to disregard it, even though the reason of the rule may appear to be frivolous, or may have ceased to be felt as just in its practical operation. But we do not admit that the rule of the common law is as it has been stated at the bar. We understand, on the contrary, that the general rule is, that debt does lie against executors upon a simple contract; and that an exception is, that it does not lie in the particular case, where the testator may wage his law. When, therefore, it is established in any given case that there can be no wager of law by the testator, debt is a proper remedy. Lord Chief Baron Comyns lays down the doctrine that debt lies against executors upon any debt or contract without specialty, where the testator could not have waged his law; and he puts the case of debt for rent upon a parol lease to exemplify it. (Com. Dig. Administration, B. 14; see also Com. Dig. Pleader, 2 W., 45, tit. 2, D. 2.) The same doctrine is laid down in ele- [*673 mentary writers. (1 Chitty's Plead., 106; Chitty on Bills, ch. 6, p. 426.) Upon this ground the action of debt is admitted to lie against executors in cases of simple contract, in courts where the wager of law is not admitted, as in the courts of London, by custom. So, in the Court of Exchequer, upon a more general principle, the wager of law is not allowed upon a quo minus. (Com. Dig. Plead., 2 W., 45; Godbolt, 291; 1 Chitty's Plead., 106, 93; Bohun's Hist. of London, 86.) The reason is obvious: the plaintiff shall not, by the form of his action, deprive the executor of any lawful plea, that might have been pleaded by his testator; and as the executor can in no case wage his law (Com. Dig. Pleader, 2 W., 45), he shall not be compelled to answer to an action in which his testator might have used that defense. Even the doctrine, with these limitations, is so purely artificial, that the executor may waive the benefit of it; and, therefore, if he omits to demur, and pleads in bar to the action; and a verdict is found against him, he cannot take advantage of the objection, either in arrest of judgment, or upon a writ of error. (2 Saund. Rep., 74, note 2, by Williams and the authorities there cited; Norwood v. Read, Plowd., 182; Cro. Eliz., 557.) Style, in his Practical Register, lays down the rule with its exact limitations. "No action," says he, "shall ever lie against an executor or administrator, where the testator or intestate might have waged their law; because they have lost the benefit of making that defense, which is a 674 good defense in that action; *and if their intestate or testator had been living, they might have taken advantage of it." (Style's Pr. Reg. and Comp. Atty. in Courts of Common Law, [1707,] p. 666.)

In the view, therefore, which we take of this case, we do not think it necessary to enter into the consideration, whether the case in 4 Bos. & Pull., 293, which denies that debt will lie against executors upon a promissory note of the testator, is law. There is, indeed, some reason to question, at least since the statute of Anne, which has put negotiable instruments upon a new and peculiar footing, whether, upon the authorities and general doctrines which regulate that defense, it ought to be applied to such instruments. The cases cited at the bar by the plaintiff's counsel, contain reasoning on this point which would deserve very serious consideration. But waiving any discussion of this point, and assuming the case in 4 Bos. & Pull., 293, to have been rightly decided, it does not govern the case now before the court; for that case does not effect to assert or decide that the action of debt will not lie in cases where there can be no wager of law.

Now, whatever may be said upon the question, whether the wager of law was ever introduced into the common law of our country by the emigration of our ancestors, it is perfectly clear that it cannot, since the establishment of the state of Tennessee, have had a legal existence in its jurisprudence. The constitution of that state has expressly declared that the trial by jury shall remain inviolate; and the constitution of the United 675 States has also declared, that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved. Any attempt to set up the wager of law would be utterly inconsistent with this acknowledged right. So that the wager of law, if it ever had a legal existence in the United States, is now completely abolished. If, then, we apply the rule of the common law to the present case, we shall arrive, necessarily, at the conclusion that the action of debt does lie against the executor, because the testator could never have waged his law in this case.

Upon the whole, the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed, with six per cent. damages and costs.

[PRACTICE. PLEADINGS.]

SIGLAR AND NALL, Administrators of WILLIAM NALL, deceased, Plaintiffs

JOHN HAYWOOD, Public Treasurer of the State of North Carolina, Defendant
in Error.

An executor or administrator is not liable to a judgment beyond the assets to be administered, unless he pleads a false plea.

Wheat. 8.

If he fail to sustain his plea of plene administravit, it is not necessarily a false plea, within his own knowledge; and, if it be found against him, the verdict ought to find the amount of assets unadministered, and the defendant is liable for that sum only.

In such a case, the judgment is de bonis testatoris, and not de bonis propriis.

*ERROR to the Circuit Court of Tennessee. [676]

This was an action of debt, brought in the court below by Haywood, the defendant in error, against Siglar and Nall, the plaintiffs in error, upon a judgment obtained against their intestate, William Nall, in the Superior Court for the District of Hillsborough, in the state of North Carolina, for the sum of $2,980.05. The defendants pleaded, (1) Nil debet, and (2) Plene administravit. The plaintiff replied to the second plea, that the defendants have, and on the day of commencing this suit had, divers goods, &c., whereof they could have satisfied the plaintiff for the debt aforesaid. On the trial, it appeared by the accounts exhibited by the defendants, that a part of the intestate's goods and chattels remained in their hands unadministered. On which, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury that the plea of plene administravit was therefore false, and that, on that ground, the plaintiff was entitled to his verdict on the whole issue. The instruction was given by the court, to which the counsel for the defendants excepted. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, for the sum of $2,565.16 debt, and $4,429.53 damages, for the detention thereof; and also found "that the defendants have not fully administered all and singular the goods and chattels, rights and credits, which were of the decedent, and which came to their hands to be administered, previous to the issuing of the writ of capias in this cause, as the plaintiff in replying hath alleged."

*Upon which, judgment was entered [677] as follows: "Therefore it is considered by the court, that the plaintiff recover against the defendants $2,565.16, the residue of the debt aforesaid, in form aforesaid assessed, and also his costs," &c. And the cause was brought by writ of error to this court.

Mr. Sergeant, for the plaintiffs in error (no counsel appearing for the defendant in error), made the following points, together with several others, which it is not thought necessary to state, because they are not noticed in the opinion of the court:

1. That the court erred in the above instruction given to the jury.

2. That the verdict was erroneous, because it did not find what goods and chattels, rights and credits of the intestate, or what amount thereof, remained in the defendants' hands unadministered.

3. The judgment was erroneous, because it is against the defendants generally, and de bonis propriis, when it ought to have been de bonis testatoris.

Under the first point he argued that the law was well settled that executors are no further chargeable than they have assets, unless they make themselves so by pleading a false plea, i. e., such a plea as would be a perpetual bar to the plaintiff, and which they know to be false, as ne unques executor, or a release to them-

678*] selves. But if they *plead a former judgment by another person, et nil ultra, and the plaintiff replies per fraudem, yet judgment shall be de bonis testatoris.<sup>1</sup> The only plea that can involve the defendant in personal responsibility (except as above stated), and that only for costs, is a plea disputing the debt.<sup>2</sup> Harrison v. Beecles<sup>3</sup> is in point. The plea there was plene administravit. It was proved that the defendant had assets, but of less amount than the plaintiff's claim. It was contended that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the whole amount. Lord Mansfield decided, after consultation with the other judges, that he could only recover the amount of assets proved, which has been the law ever since.

Upon the second point, if an executor plead plene administravit, and issue is joined thereon, and the jury find that the defendant had goods in his hands, but do not find the value, the verdict is void for uncertainty.<sup>4</sup>

As to the mode of entering judgment against an executor or administrator, and afterwards proceeding thereon, he cited 2 Tidd's Pract., 842, 894, 929, 1017-1020.

679*] Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents several questions of some difficulty; but, as the argument has been ex parte, and there are other points on which the judgment must necessarily be reversed, the court will confine its opinion to those on which no doubt can arise.

At the trial of the issue of fully administered, the plaintiff's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury "that as it appeared, by the accounts exhibited by the defendants, that a part remained in their hands unadministered, that the plea was therefore false, and that on that ground he was entitled to their verdict on the whole issue." This instruction was given by the court, and to this opinion the counsel for the defendants excepted.

It is now well settled, and the case cited from Cranch, in the argument, is founded on the principle that if an administrator fails to sustain his plea of fully administered, he is not, on that account, liable to a judgment beyond the assets to be administered. The plea is not necessarily false within his own knowledge; he may have failed to adduce proof of payments actually made. It is not required that the plea should state with precision the assets remaining unadministered; and an executor or administrator would always incur great hazard, if he were required to state and prove the precise sum remaining in his hands, under the penalty of being exposed to a judgment for the whole amount claimed, whatever it might be. To state a full administration, without proving it, would be useless. The rule and usage, 680*] therefore, *is, that if the plea of fully administered be found against the defendant, the verdict ought to find the amount of assets unadministered, and the defendant is liable for that sum only. The instruction of the court, on this point, is erroneous, and, consequently, the verdict and judgment founded on it, must be set aside and reversed.

The same error is in the verdict. Instead of finding the amount of assets remaining unadministered, it finds the whole amount claimed, which, as was decided in the case already mentioned, is clearly erroneous.

There is also additional error in the judgment which is rendered against the administrators, de bonis propriis instead of being de bonis testatoris. For these errors, the judgment must be reversed, and the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for farther proceedings according to law.

Judgment reversed.

JUDGMENT.—This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the Court of the United States for the Seventh Circuit in the District of East Tennessee, and was argued by counsel on the part of the plaintiffs in error. On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that there is error in the record and proceedings of the said Circuit Court, in this, that the said court instructed the jury, on the trial of the issue, on the plea of fully administered, that as it appears by the accounts exhibited by the defendants, a part remained in their hands unadministered, *the plea was therefore 681 false, and that, on that ground, the plaintiff was entitled to their verdict on the whole issue; and also in this, that the jury have found a verdict, on the plea of fully administered, against the defendants, without finding the sum unadministered; and also in this, that the judgment on the said verdict is absolute against the administrators themselves, instead of being, to be levied of the goods and chattels of their intestate, in their hands to be administered.

Whereupon it is considered by the court, that the said judgment be reversed, and the verdict be set aside, and the cause remanded to the said Circuit Court, that further proceedings may be had therein according to law.

THE CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON ET AL., Appellants, PRATT, FRANCIS ET AL., Respondents.

Under the eighth section of the act of 1812, to amend the act for the incorporation of the city of Washington, a sale of unimproved squares or lots in the city, for the payment of taxes, is illegal, unless such squares and lots have been assessed to the true and lawful proprietors thereof.

The lien upon each lot, for the taxes, is several and distinct, and the purchaser of each holds his lot unencumbered with the taxes due on the other lots held by his vendor.

If the sale of one or more lots produce the amount of taxes actually due on the whole by the same proprietor, the corporation cannot proceed to sell further.

A PPEAL from the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia.

This cause was argued by the Attorney-General and Mr. Key for the appellants, and by Mr. Jones for the respondents.

Mr. Justice JOHNSON delivered the opinion of the court:

A number of lots in the city of Washington, the property of the respondents, having been sold for payment of taxes, assessed under authority of the appellants, to the use of the city, this bill was filed by the respondents, in the Circuit Court of the District, to enjoin the corporation from executing conveyances to the purchasers.

The allegations on which the claim for relief was asserted, presented to the view of the court below a variety of irregularities, previous to, or accompanying the sale, which that court decided to be deviations from the provisions of the law of Congress, authorizing the sale. A perpetual injunction was therefore decreed, and from that decree the defendants below have appealed.

There have been various questions submitted to the consideration of this court, in the argument, which, with a view to precision, shall be stated in the parties' own language, in their order.

683*] *1. The first is, whether sales of unimproved squares, or lots, in the city of Washington, to pay two years' taxes thereon, pursuant to the 8th section of the act of Congress, passed in the year 1812, entitled, "An act, further to amend the act for the incorporation of the city," would be illegal, merely because such squares and lots had not been assessed to the true and lawful proprietors thereof, without any wilful mistake or neglect on the part of the persons who made the assessment, the assessors having used due diligence to ascertain the true proprietors.

This question, as well as every other in the cause, must find a solution in the provisions of the law which vests the power to sell. Where these are explicit and consistent, there is no ground for adjudication but their literal meaning. That they must be construed strictly, follows from their affecting private rights, and particularly rights of freehold; and that they must be pursued strictly, is the consequence of their being the sole foundation of the powers executed under them.

The 7th section of the act of incorporation of 1802, vests in the corporation a very general power to lay and collect taxes; but the next section of the same act limits their power in enforcing payment of taxes to a distress and sale of goods, and contains an express prohibition against subjecting vacant lots to a sale for taxes. As no goods could be expected to be found on such lots, it became necessary to pass this act of 1812, the 8th section of which is in these words: "That unimproved lots in the city of may be necessary to pay such taxes, may be sold at public sale, for such taxes due thereon. Provided, that public notice be given of the time and place of sale, by advertising, in some paper printed in the city of Washington, at least six months, where the property belongs to persons residing out of the United States; three months, where the property belongs to persons residing within the United States, and without the limits of the District of Columbia; and six weeks, where the property belongs to persons residing within the District of Columbia, or city of Washington; in which notice shall be stated the number of the lot or lots, the number of the square or squares, the name of the person or persons to whom the same may have been assessed, and also the amount of taxes due thereon." And then follows another proviso, securing to the proprietor the right to redeem within two years after such sale.

In legislating upon this subject, the corporation has sanctioned an assessment to the owners, or supposed owners; and the real state of the question is, whether this is not going beyond the power of sale, as delegated to them by the act of Congress. This, again, depends upon the question, whether the person "to whom," in the language of the clause cited, "the lots may have been assessed," can mean any other than the actual owner of such lot.

We think it cannot. It was undoubtedly in the power of Congress to have left what latitude they pleased to the assessor in designating the owner; but if they have confined him to the necessity of determining the true owner, it is not in our power to enlarge his discretion. It may be a hardship upon the corporation, but the legislature only can decide whether that hardship shall be perpetuated or not. It must be observed that the alternative is one which would put it in the power of the assessor to designate a mere nominal owner, a kind of casual ejector, in every case. Had Congress intended to lighten the labors of the corporation, or their assessor, in this respect, there were very simple means of doing it; they might have sanctioned a designation with reference to the first or last vendee of record. But it is obvious that Congress were very jealous of the exercise of this power over the lots of absentees; and in the previous provisions of this eighth section, they make the right of selling, with reference to the time of advertising, to depend expressly upon ownership; not reputed ownership or assessment; "to whom the property belongs," are the words of the law. When, therefore, they afterwards speak of publishing the name of the person to whom the lot was assessed, they must be held to mean the name of him who was owner at the time of the assessment. This removes many of the inconveniences apprehended from subsequent or fraudulent transfers; and the inquiries remaining to be made by the assessor, will be greatly simplified by the operation of the registering law of the district. It will seldom happen that the legal estate does not, in fact, exist in the last vendee of record, or his heirs or devisees. The name of the real party in interest must have been, in the eyes of Congress, the most awakening circumstance of the advertisement required to warn him of his danger.

Wheat, 8.

2. The second question is, whether, where several lots belonged and were assessed to one person, and two years' taxes were due on every one of them, it would be lawful to sell one of the lots to pay the taxes due upon all, or each lot would be liable only to be sold to pay the tax due on itself.

This question, thus stated, does not admit of a general answer.

That each lot stands encumbered with no more than its own taxes, and the lien upon each is several and distinct, results, not less from the provisions of this eighth section, which gives the right of redeeming severally, than from the consideration that in case of a partial sale by the proprietor of many lots, the purchaser from him would not, by the act of transfer, hold his purchase disencumbered of its own particular taxes, either absolutely, or upon the contingency of the remaining lots of his vendor being adequate to the satisfaction of the taxes due on the whole. Nor would a purchaser of a single lot hold his purchase encumbered with the taxes due on the whole mass of lots held by the vendor; each would have the right to redeem, upon paying the taxes assessed on his own particular purchase, and would hold his purchase subject to such taxes.

The provisions of the act are clearly intended 687* to raise the tax of each lot from itself. The words are, so much thereof, not so many; as they must have been, after speaking of "unimproved lots," had it been intended to authorize the sale of some for the taxes of others; and not the sale of each one, or "so much" as is necessary of each one, for the payment of its own taxes. Apply the enacting words to the case of an owner of a single lot, and the effect of the word "much" can only be to authorize a sale of part of a lot, whenever circumstances will admit of such a sale, and the sum due will not require more. But if taxes be due by one and the same individual, in small sums, upon many lots, and one lot being set up for sale, produces a sum adequate to the payment of all, the whole arrears become paid off, and no excuse can then exist for making further sales.

This exposition disposes of the second question.

3. The third question is, whether it be necessary that the advertisement should contain a particular statement of the amount of taxes due on each lot separately; or where several lots belong to the same person, whether it would be sufficient to state in the advertisement the aggregate amount of taxes due on all the lots so belonging to the same person.

This may be a very immaterial question practically, and it may not be very easy to assign a sufficient reason of policy for the one or other alternative. But what have we to do with such inquiries in cases of positive enactment? The law must be pursued, whatever be the previous 688* steps required. The difficulty here presented is grounded on the use of the words in this eighth section, "amount of taxes." This, in its ordinary import, expresses an aggregate of taxes. But it is obvious that we cannot here apply that aggregate idea to a sum made up from the taxes of many lots; since this would also support the sufficiency of a publication exhibiting nothing more than the amount of taxes upon the whole list of lots advertised, whoever be the proprietors. Some more appropriate signification must therefore be sought for it; and this is easily found; for when it is considered that the taxes of each lot are made several liens upon each, it follows that this aggregate idea can have reference only to the amount made up from the arrears of the two years, which must be due to authorize a sale.

We therefore think that the taxes of each lot ought to be severally exhibited. The operation of such a provision must be the test of its own policy. The duty is easily complied with, and the performance of it may not be destitute of practical utility.

4. The fourth point has not been pressed by the appellants' counsel, nor can there be a doubt entertained that it is altogether against the appellants. The publication of the sum due was as necessary under the eighth section as any other act required by it; the circumstance of time in the advertisement, therefore, could not have been dispensed with as to that particular. An increase of the sum demanded necessarily required the extension of the time of advertising. Non constat *but that the 689 smaller sum may have been provided and ready on the day of sale; or that the larger would not have been provided within the legal time, had the advertisement been continued.

5. The fifth question is, whether, if unimproved lots, on which two years' taxes be due, be advertised for sale, and the amount stated be greater than that actually due, the sale of such lots will be void; and if void, whether for the whole, or only for the amount of excess, when the amount is divisible, as it may be in the sale of several lots.

This question may be disposed of thus: As it supposes that two years' taxes are actually due, there can be no doubt that the lots may be severally sold; for the greater sum includes the less, and the owner had his remedy to prevent a sale by tendering the amount actually due on any particular lot set up for sale. But if the corporation are suffered to go on to sell, and the sale of any one or more lots shall produce the amount actually due on the whole, by the same individual, it is clearly at their peril to proceed further. They must, in law, be held cognizant of the amount justly demandable, and have no power to sell, but for taxes actually due.

The sixth question we understand to be withdrawn; and the seventh, at least in one view of it, we consider as disposed of in the answers to the first and fifth. If two years' taxes be actually due by the party whose property is advertised, and it be not tendered, the sale must be valid, *and the owner 690 must be left to his remedy against the corporation for adjusting the correct amount. But if it be intended to obtain the decision of this court, whether one man's lots can be legally sold for another man's debts, we cannot perceive that it will admit of a question; nor can it ever occur, if the course be pursued which is marked out by this decision.

The tenth point made in the cause, is one which goes to contest the correctness of the decision below, on a general principle of equity; but, understanding this question, as well as that which arises upon the ground of the complainant's supposed remedy at law, to be withdrawn, we shall decline noticing them.

SNEED ET AL., Plaintiffs in Error,
v.

WISTER ET AL., Defendants in Error.

The act of assembly of Kentucky, of the 7th of February, 1812, "giving interest on judgments for damages, in certain cases," applies as well to cases depending in the circuit courts of the Union, as to proceedings in similar cases in the state courts.

The party is as well entitled to interest in an action on an appeal bond, as if he were to proceed on the judgment, if the judgment be on a contract for the payment of money. He is entitled to interest from the rendition of the original judgment.

691*] *Oyer is not demandable of a record; nor, in an action upon a bond for performance of covenants in another deed, can oyer of such deed be craved; for the defendant, and not the plaintiff, must show it, with a profert of it, or an excuse for the omission.

If oyer be improperly demanded, the defect is aided on a general demurrer; but it is fatal to the plea, where it is set down as a cause of demurrer.

Nil debet is an improper plea to an action of debt upon a specialty or deed, where it is the foundation of the action.

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Kentucky.

This was an action of debt, brought in the Circuit Court for the District of Kentucky, by the defendants in error, against the plaintiffs, upon a bond in the penalty of $4,000, with condition that the said A. Sneed should prosecute with effect his appeal from a judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court, pronounced in a suit wherein the said Wister and others were plaintiffs, and the said A. Sneed was defendant, and should well and truly pay to the said obligees all such damages and costs as should be awarded against him, in case the said judgment should be affirmed in whole or in part, or the appeal should be dismissed or discontinued.

The averments in the declaration are, that the said A. Sneed did not prosecute his said appeal with effect, but that afterwards, at a certain term of the Court of Appeals, the said judgment was affirmed, and judgment rendered in favor of the said plaintiffs against the said defendant, A. Sneed, for damages at the rate of ten per cent. on the amount of the said judgment, to wit, on the sum of $1,895.13½, as by the records of the said Court of Appeals would appear. And further, that [692 the said judgment, rendered by the said Franklin Circuit Court, was for $1,895.13½ damages, and $ costs, as would appear by the records of the said court. The declaration then avers that the said A. Sneed hath not paid to the said plaintiffs the said damages and costs aforesaid, or either of them, whereby action accrued.

To this declaration, the defendants, after demanding oyer of the bond, and condition thereof, in the declaration mentioned, and also of the judgment of the Court of Appeals, therein proffered, pleads in bar of the action: 1. That by the judgment and mandate of the said Court of Appeals, the said cause was remanded to the Circuit Court of Franklin, where the judgment of the said Court of Appeals, according to the mandate, was entered up as the judgment of the said court of Franklin; and that after the said judgment was so entered, viz., on the 19th of August, 1820, in the clerk's office of the said court, the said A. Sneed, according to the laws of Kentucky, did replevy the said sum in the declaration mentioned, by acknowledging recognizances, called replevin bonds, before the said clerk, together with Landon Sneed, his surty in said recognizances for the said sums of money, damages and costs, in the declaration mentioned, to be paid in one year from the date thereof; the said clerk having lawful authority to take said replevin bonds, having by law the force of judgments, and then remaining in the said court in full force, not quashed, &c. 2. The second plea is

Interest is allowed—First, on a special agreement. Second, on an implied promise, which

693*] nil debet. *To these pleas the plaintiffs demurred, and assigned for cause of demurrer, to the first, that it contains a prayer of oyer of records, of which profert was not made, and of which the defendants had no right to oyer; and further, that the said plea is defective, in not setting forth where the replevin bond pleaded was executed, that the court might judge whether there was any authority to take it.

The demurrers being joined, the court below gave judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and awarded a writ of inquiry to assess the damages to which they were entitled. On this inquiry, the defendants' counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, 1. That the damages of ten per cent. on affirmance cannot be given, because not within the breaches assigned; and 2. That they ought not to allow interest on the damages in the original judgment, for any period before affirmance.

These instructions the court refused to give; but did, upon the motion of the counsel for the plaintiffs, instruct the jury that the act of assembly of Kentucky, of the 7th of February, 1812, "giving interest on judgments for damages in certain cases," applies to cases depending in this court, in actions on appeal bonds, as much as to proceedings in similar cases in the state courts. That the party is as well entitled to interest in an action on the appeal bond, as if he were to proceed on the judgment at law; and that, by law, the plaintiff is entitled to interest on the amount of his judgment, from the time it was rendered in the Franklin Circuit Court.

C. 99; U. S. v. Ormsby, 3 Wash. C. C. 195.

Whether the replevin bond entered into by A. Sneed, in the clerk's office of the Franklin Circuit Court, could be pleaded in bar of the action on the appeal bond, is a question which this court would feel no hesitation in deciding, could we have succeeded in our efforts to obtain the act or acts of the Kentucky legislature which authorized the giving such bonds. The same reason prevents this court from giving an opinion as to the alleged insufficiency of the first plea, in not setting forth where the replevin bond, so pleaded, was executed, that the court might judge whether there was any authority for taking the same. If the cause turned exclusively upon those points, we should deem a continuance of it proper, until the counsel could have an opportunity of furnishing the court with those laws. This, we think, is not the case, being all of opinion, that, for the other cause of demurrer *assigned to the first [*695 plea, the judgment of the court below, upon that plea, was correct. In this case no profert was made, in the declaration, of the records therein mentioned, nor would it have been proper to do so. And even if a profert be unnecessarily, or improperly made, still the defendant is not entitled to demand oyer of the instrument, but is bound to plead without it. We take the law to be that oyer is not demandable of a record; nor in an action upon a bond, for performance of covenants in another deed, can oyer of such deed be craved, but the defendant, and not the plaintiff, must show it, or the counterpart, with a profert of it, or an excuse for the omission. If oyer be improperly demanded, and the instrument be stated upon it, although the defect in the plea would be aided on a general demurrer, it is nevertheless fatal to the plea, where it is set forth as a cause of demurrer. The whole of this doctrine is laid down in 1 Chitty's Plead., 302, third Am. ed.

As to the plea of nil debet, to which there is a demurrer, it is clearly bad, no principle of law being better settled than that this is an improper plea to an action of debt upon a specialty or deed, where it is the foundation of the action.

This brings the court to the consideration of the instructions given to the jury upon the application of the plaintiffs' counsel; and we are of opinion that the act referred to was strictly applicable to this case, in like manner as it would have been had this action been brought in a state court; and that, according to the clear 696* expressions of that act, the plaintiffs were entitled to legal interest on the damages recovered in the Franklin Circuit Court, from the time of the rendition of that judgment, since it fully appeared, by the record of the Court of Appeals, that the judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court was rendered on a contract to pay money. The act declares, in substance, that every judgment rendered after the passage of the act, founded upon contract sealed or unsealed, expressed or implied, for the payment of money, &c., which should be delayed in the execution, by proceedings on the part of the defendant, by injunction, writ of error, &c., with a supersedeas, or an appeal to the Court of Appeals, should, in the event of the judgment being affirmed, bear legal interest from the rendition of the judgment, &c. The last part of the section, which declares it to be the duty of the clerk of the court in which the judgment was rendered, to indorse on the execution that the same is to bear legal interest until paid, is strictly applicable to the remedy, and not to the right. The latter is given by the preceding parts of the act; but it can only be enforced where the plaintiff proceeds by execution, by virtue of the indorsement on that process, which it is the duty of the clerk to make.

The court is also of opinion that the court below was right in refusing to give the first instruction asked for by the defendants' counsel, inasmuch as the breaches assigned do, in our apprehension, manifestly embrace the ten per 697* cent. *damages given upon affirmance by the Court of Appeals. And if the above opinion, in respect to the interest to which the plaintiff was entitled, be correct, it follows that the court below was right in refusing to give the second instruction asked for by the defendants' counsel.

cover the money which the plaintiff in error had been decreed by a Court of Chancery to pay to the defendants in error. The defendant in the court below contended, that an *action [698 at common law did not lie on a decree in chancery, and excepted to the opinion of that court overruling this objection. It is admitted by the opposite counsel, that, in general, the action does not lie to recover money claimed under the decree of a court in equity, but he supposed that, in this case, the money had been received by the defendant below, upon transactions which took place after the decree. Upon examining the record, we perceive that the money was in his hands, as trustee, at the time the order to pay it over was made.

An objection was also made to an opinion of the Circuit Court upon another part of the case. There was an agreement between the parties, under seal, and having some relation to the money to which part of the claim relates, and the defendant below objected to the form of the action on that account. But we cannot discover, from the bill of exceptions, whether the money in contest was, or was not, received under that instrument. On that point, therefore, the Court gives no opinion. The judgment is to be reversed for error in the opinion of the court below, which declares the action to be sustainable on the decretal order of the Court of Chancery, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court for further proceedings.

It is not necessary to aver on the record that the defendant in the Circuit Court was an inhabitant of the district, or was found therein at the time of serving the writ. Where the defendant appears, without taking the exception, it is an admission of the regularity of the service.

MR. WEBSTER moved to dismiss the writ of error in this case, for want of jurisdiction. He stated that the plaintiffs below, Palmer and others, were described to be aliens, and subjects of the King of Great Britain, and the defendants, Gracie and others, to be citizens of the state of New York; and the suit was brought in the Circuit Court of Pennsylvania. It did not appear that the defendants were inhabitants of, or found in the district of Pennsylvania, at the time of serving the writ; and he therefore contended, under the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, that no civil suit could be brought against them by original process in that district.

Mr. Chief Justice MARSHALL stated that the uniform construction, under the clause of the act referred to, had been that it was not necessary to aver, on the record, that the defendant was an inhabitant of the district, or found therein. That *it was sufficient if the [700 Court appeared to have jurisdiction by the citizenship or alienage of the parties. The exemption from arrest in a district in which the defendant was not an inhabitant, or in which he was not found at the time of serving the process, was the privilege of the defendant, which he might waive by a voluntary appearance. That if process was returned by the marshal as served upon him within the district, it was sufficient; and that where the defendant voluntarily appeared in the court below, without taking the exception, it was an admission of the service, and a waiver of any further inquiry into the matter.

[*NOTE I.]

ON THE CASE OF GREEN ET AL. v. BIDDLE, ante, p. 1-108.

The editor has supposed that the learned reader would not be dissatisfied to see collected together the authorities from the civilians, and also from the common law, and the decisions of the courts of equity, bearing upon the principal question in the above case. The leading principals of the civil law on the subject, are stated by Justinian as follows:

“De edificatione ex sua materia in solo alieno.

ratio neque consumptorum, neque non perceptorum. Post inchoatam autem petitionem etiam illorum fructuum ratio habetur, qui culpa possessoris percepti non sunt, vel percepti consumpti sunt.”

So also, the Napoleon Code, which is in a great measure copied from the civil law, declares (liv. 2, tit. 2, art. 546) that “the property of a thing, whether movable or immovable, gives a right to all which it produces, and to everything which is inseparably united with it, whether naturally or artificially.

“547. The natural or artificial fruits of the earth, the civil fruits, and the increase of animals, belong to the owner by right of accession.

“548. The fruits thus produced belong to the owner of the thing producing them, provided he re-imburse the expense of the labor bestowed upon it by third persons.

“549. A mere occupant does not make these fruits his own, unless he is a bonæ fidei possessor; in the contrary case, he is bound to restore the products with the thing, to the owner who claims it.

“550. He is considered as a bonæ fidei possessor, when he possesses, as proprietor, in virtue of a title to the property, of the defects of which he is ignorant. He ceases to be such the moment these defects are known to him.

“551. Every object which unites and incorporates itself with the thing, belongs to the owner, according to the rules hereinafter established.”

“555. Where plantations, buildings, and other works have been made or erected by a third person, with materials belonging to him, the owner of the land has a right either to retain them, or to compel such third person to remove them.

“If the owner insists upon the suppression of the plantations and *buildings, it must be [*5*] done at the expense of the person who has made or erected them, without any indemnity to him; he may even be adjudged in damages, if there be ground for it, for the injury done to the owner of the land.

“If the owner chooses to preserve the plantations and buildings as his own, he must reimburse the value of the materials and labor bestowed on them, without regard to the more or less augmentation in value of the land. But if the plantations, buildings, and other works, have been made or erected by a party who has been evicted from the possession, but who was not adjudged to restore the fruits, by reason of his being a bonæ fidei possessor, the owner cannot insist upon the suppression of the said works, plantations, and buildings, but shall have the election either to re-imburse the value of the materials and labor, or to pay a sum equal to the augmented value of the land."

So, also, in the law of Scotland, which is mainly founded upon the Roman law—"A bonæ fidei possessor is he who, though he is not really proprietor of the subject, yet believes himself proprietor, on probable grounds. A malæ fidei possessor knows, or is presumed to know, that what he possessed is the property of another. A possessor bona fide, acquired right, by the Roman law, to the fruits of the subject possessed, that had been reaped and consumed by himself, while he believed the subject his own. (Sec. 35, Inst. de rer. div.) By our customs, perception alone, without consumption, secures the possessor. Nay, if he has sown the ground while his bona fides continued, he is entitled to reap the crop, propter curam et culturam. But this doctrine does not, according to Bankt. I., 214, sec. 19, reach to civil fruits, e. g., the interest of money, which the bonæ fidei receiver must restore, together with the principal, to the owner.

"Bona fides necessarily ceases by the conscientia rei alienæ in the possessor, whether such consciousness should proceed from legal interpellation, or private knowledge; for the essence of bona fides consists in the possessor's opinion that the subject is his own. (Lib. 20, sec. 11, de her. pet., 20 Nov., 1662, Children of Woolmet.) The decision, 14 March, 1626, brought by Viscount Stair, in support of the contrary opinion, proves no more than that an assignation, without intimation, is an incomplete deed. Malæ fides is sometimes induced by the true owner's bringing his action against the possessor, by which the lameness of his title may appear to him; sometimes not till litiscontestation, which was the general rule of the Roman law; and, in cases uncommonly favorable, it is not induced until sentence be pronounced against the possessor." (Erskine's Princ. of the law of Scotland, B. 2, tit. 1, s. 13, 14.)

6*] *Pothier has discussed this subject with his usual precision; and the following translation of a few passages from his treatise "Du Droit de Propriété" may not be unacceptable to the learned reader.

"335. A malæ fidei possessor is bound to account for all the fruits of the thing recovered which he has received, not only those which he received after the judicial demand, but those which have come to his hands subsequent to his unlawful possession: Certum est malæ fidei possessorem omnes fructus solere præstare cum ipsa re. (L. 22, Cod. de rei vind.)

"He is held accountable, even for those proceeding from the crops which he has sown, and the labor he has bestowed on the land; but from these must be deducted the value of the seed and labor expended by him.

"The reason is, that all the fruits which the land produces are accessaries to the land, which, as soon as they are gathered, jure accessionis, become the property of the owner of the land, as we have seen supra, n. 151, instead of belonging to him whose labor has produced them; from whence this maxim: Omnis fructus non

"He is held accountable, not only for the fruits which are the products of the thing itself, and which are termed natural fruits; he ought, also, to account for the civil fruits, as we have seen in the preceding paragraph.

"336. A malæ fidei possessor is not only held accountable for the fruits which he has received, but even for those which he has not received, but which the owner might have received, if the land had been restored to him: Generaliter, says Papinian, quum de fructibus æstimandis queritur, constat adverti debere, non an malæ fidei possessor fructus sit, sed an petitor frui poterit, si ei possidere licuerit. (L. 62, s. 1, D. de rei vind.)

"The reason is, that a malæ fidei possessor contracts, by the knowledge which he has that the property does not belong to him, the implied obligation to restore it to the owner; on failure of which he is responsible for the damages and interest resulting from this obligation, in which are included the fruits which the owner has failed to receive.

"The heir, or other representative of the malæ fidei possessor; even if he supposes in good faith that the property belongs to him, is held accountable for all the fruits received subsequent to the unlawful possession of the deceased to whom he succeeds, in the same manner as the deceased would be held accountable, if he were still living; because in his character of heir he has succeeded to all his obligations, and his possession *is merely a continuation of [*7 that of the ancestor, and is infected with all its vices, as we have observed in the preceding article.

"337. According to the principles of the Roman law, a bonæ fidei possessor is not liable to restore the fruits received by him before the litiscontestation, except those which at that period specifically remain; but he is responsible for all the fruits subsequently received, in the same manner as a malæ fidei possessor; Certum est malæ fidei possessores omnes fructus præstare; bonæ fidei vero, extantes post litiscontestationem, universos. (L. 22, Cod. de rei vind.)

"340. That which we have laid down, as to a bonæ fidei possessor not being responsible for the fruits received and consumed by him before the suit, only applies in those cases where he has received and consumed them whilst his bona fides continued; but where he has had notice, although long before the judicial demand, that the property of which he is in possession belongs to another, he can no longer receive for his own profit the fruits proceeding from it, nor discharge himself from the obligation of restoring those which specifically remain, by afterwards consuming them."

"341. The principles of our French law, in respect to the restitution of the fruits, in an action in rem, in the case of a malæ fidei possessor, are the same with those of the Roman law, as they have already been explained.

"As to a bonæ fidei possessor, he is not bound to restore any fruits received by him before the judicial demand. I do not find that in our practice (different in that respect from the Roman law)—that the demandant can claim the fruits which specifically remain in the hands of the occupant at that period, where they have been previously received.

"But by the notice which is given to a bonæ fidei possessor, in which the demandant exhibits to him a copy of his title deeds, and which has consequently, in this respect, in our law, the same effect as the litiscontestation in the Roman law, he ceases to be any longer a bonæ fidei possessor, being considered as informed of the demandant's right by this notice; he cannot, therefore, be any longer considered as entitled to receive the fruits, and must be adjudged to restore all those which he has received subsequent to the notice."

"343. Where, in the action rei vindicationis, the demandant has established his right, the possessor is adjudged to restore him the thing recovered; but in certain cases, where the possessor has disbursed a certain sum, or contracted an obligation for the removing an incumbrance, for the preservation or amelioration of the thing which he is adjudged to restore, the judgment is rendered upon condition that the demandant shall re-imburse the possessor for the sums he has expended, and indemnify him in other respects."

"344. The second case is that to which Papius refers in the latter part of the law sumptuum in prædium factorum exemplo: Where the possessor has incurred any necessary expenses for the preservation of the thing (other than ordinary repairs) which the proprietor would have been obliged to incur, if the possessor had not, the owner cannot compel the possessor to restore the thing, unless he first re-imburses to this possessor the amount thus expended by him, with the interest thereon, if it exceeds the fruits which the possessor has received, which are to be set-off against it.

"We have excepted from the operation of our principle the expenses of ordinary repairs, because these are a charge upon the fruits, and for this reason, a bonæ fidei possessor, who receives for his own account the fruits before the judicial demand, without being subject in this respect to make restitution to the owner, ought not to claim against the latter the expenses of ordinary repairs incurred by him during the same period, these expenses being a charge upon the usufruct which he has enjoyed.

"345. There is a distinction between a bonæ fidei and a mali fidei possessor, in respect to the expenses which they have laid out, which were not indispensably necessary, but only useful, and which have merely contributed to ameliorate the property.

"In respect to a bonæ fidei possessor, the owner cannot compel him to restore the property, without first re-imbursing the expenses, although they were not indispensably necessary to the preservation of the property, and have merely augmented its value.

"Justinian gives an example of this principle in the case of a bonæ fidei possessor, who has erected a building upon the land; and he decides that the owner cannot recover the land unless he first offers to re-imburse this expense to the occupant: Si quis in alieno solo ex sua materia domum edificaverit. . . . illud constat, si in possessione constituto edificatore soli dominus petat domum suam esse, nec solvat pretium materiæ et mercedes fabrorum, posse eum exceptionem doli mali repelli, utique si bonæ fidei possessor fuerit qui edificavit. (Instit. tit. de rer. div. s. 30.)

"346. This principle, that a bonæ fidei possessor ought to be re-imbursed the expenses of utility which he has laid out upon the property, is subject to several exceptions, which must be considered as implied in the text we have just cited from the Institutes, as Vinnius has remarked in his commentary.

"The first is, that the possessor ought not to be re-imbursed precisely *and absolutely [*9] for the amount of the said expenses, but only for the amount which they have augmented the property in value.

"This is what Paulus teaches us in the case of a bonæ fidei purchaser who has erected a building upon land which had been previously mortgaged. Paulus says: Ius soli superficiem secutam videri. . . . sed bonæ fidei possessores non aliter cogendos ædificium restituere, quàm sumptus in extructione erogatos, quatenus res pretiosior facta est, reciperent. (Lib. 59, s. 2, D. d. pign.)

"This results from the principle on which is founded the obligation of the proprietor to re-imburse the expenses of the bonæ fidei possessor.

"This obligation arises only from that rule of equity which forbids one person from enriching himself at the expense of another, without the fault of the latter. According to this rule, the owner ought not to profit, at the cost of the possessor, of the expenses which the latter has incurred; but he thus profits by it only so far as his property is augmented in value by these expenses; he ought not, therefore, to repay more than to that amount, even though the possessor has paid more.

"On the other hand, even if the value of the property is augmented to a greater amount than the expenditure laid out upon it, the owner is not obliged to repay more than the expenditures; because, although he has profited to a greater amount, he has only profited, at the expense of the possessor, to the amount of the sums actually laid out by him.

"The second exception to the principle, that a bonæ fidei possessor is entitled to be re-imbursed his expenditures of utility, at least to the extent of the increased value of the property is, that the rule is not so inflexible but that the judge may sometimes depart from it, according to circumstances. This is what Celsus teaches:

In fundo alieno quem imprudens edificasti aut conseruisti, deinde evincitur, bonus iudex varie in personis causisque constituet: finge et dominum eadem facturum fuisse;¹ reddat impensam et fundum recipiat, usque² cò duntaxat quò pretiosior factus est; et si plus pretio fundi accessit, solum quod impensum est. Finge pauperem qui si id reddere cogatur, laribus, sepulchris arvis carendum habeat: sufficit tibi permitti tollere ex his rebus quæ possis; dum ita ne deterior sit fundus quàm si initio non fuerit edificatum. (Lib. 38. D. de rei vind.)

"In the case put by Celsus, if there be this equitable consideration in favor of the occupant, that the owner ought not to profit, at his expense, *by the augmentation in value [*10] which the land has received from the expenditures laid out on it, on the other hand, there is another equitable consideration, still more strong, in favor of the owner, to which the other must yield, which is, that equity still less permits the owner to be deprived of his inheritance, for which he may be supposed to have a just affection, because he is unable to re-imburse expenditures which he did not wish to have laid out upon the property which he has no desire to sell, and which would answer all his purposes in its original condition.

1.—Id est, maximè hoc casu debet reddere impensam, sed etsi facturum non fuisset regulariter debet reddere.

2.—This refers to impensam reddat.

"Where the expenditures of utility, laid out by the bonæ fidei possessor, are so considerable that the owner is unable to repay them, before taking possession of his land, and these expenditures have, at the same time, produced a considerable augmentation in its rent, it seems to me that the interests of the respective parties may be conciliated by allowing the owner to take possession, upon condition that he should charge the land with the repayment of the amount of these expenditures by installments. By these means, the just rights of both parties will be preserved; the owner is not deprived of his land, for want of the means of payment, and at the same time he does not profit, at the expense of the occupant, by its increased value."

Our author then proceeds (No. 348) to state that there are expenditures which may augment the value of the thing, supposing the owner to wish to sell it without increasing the rent or profit derived from it, supposing him to wish to retain it for his own use; in which case, the owner is not obliged to re-imburse the bonæ fidei possessor, unless the owner be himself a dealer in such articles, and has, therefore, derived a pecuniary benefit from the increased value of the thing. And he quotes, as an example of the application of this rule, a case put in the Digest, of a slave in the hands of a bonæ fidei possessor, who has instructed him in painting, or some other elegant art, and the slave being reclaimed by his master, the latter is not responsible to the possessor for his increased value, unless the master be himself a dealer in slaves.

He then states (No. 349) a third exception to the rule, which obliges the owner to re-imburse the bonæ fidei possessor the expenses of utility laid out on the property, which is, that the rents and profits received by the occupant are to be first deducted.

"350. As to a malæ fidei possessor, the Roman law seems to have denied him the re-imbursement of the expenses not absolutely necessary for the preservation of the property, although they may have augmented its value, and only to have allowed him the privilege of carrying off such articles as could be severed without injury to the property, and leaving it in its original state. Malæ fidei possessores, says 11*] the Emperor Gordian, **ejus quod in alienam rem impendunt, non eorum negotiam gerentes quorum est, nullam habent repetitionem, nisi necessarios sumptus fecerint; sin autem utiles, licentia eis permittitur, sine læsione prioris status rei, eos auferre.* (Lib. 5, Cod., h. t.)

"The same also says elsewhere: Vincas in alieno agro institutas solo cedere, et si à malæ fidei possessore id factum sit, sumptus eo nomine erogatos per retentionem servari non posse incognitum non est. (Lib. 1, tit. de rei vind. in fragm. Cod. Gregor.)

"Lastly, Justinian, in the institutes (de rer. div. s. 30), after having stated that he who has built upon the land of another is entitled to a re-imbursement of his expenditures by the owner, adds, utique si bonæ fidei possessor sit; nam si scienti solum alienum esse, potest objici culpa, quod edificaverit temerè in eo solo quod intelligebat alienum esse."

Pothier then states, that notwithstanding these positive texts, Cujas (Obs. X., cap. I.) supposes that the malæ fidei possessor is to be put on the same footing, in this respect, with the bonæ fidei possessor, and is equally entitled to be re-imbursed his expenditures, by which the land has been increased in value. Our author, after having refuted this notion, proceeds to observe, that in practice it is left to the discretion of the judge to decide whether the owner ought to indemnify a malæ fidei possessor for the expenses of utility, to the amount of the increased value of the land, according to the nature and extent of the malæ fides of the possessor, whether it is characterized by circumstances more or less criminal. (See, also, Huber. Prælect., lib. 5, tit. 3., de Hered. Petit., s. 12-19; Pothier, Pandect. Just. in Nov. Ord. Digest., Tom. 1, p. 186-191; Ib., p. 201-204; Argou, Instit. au Droit Français, Tom. 2, liv. 4, ch. 17; Domat, Loix Civiles, liv. 3, tit 5, sec. 3.)

The subject under consideration has been treated somewhat at large by Lord Kaimes, in his Principles of Equity. The following citations will show that the author's notions of abstract justice, and his legal principles deduced from them, are in general accordance with the law of England, as well as with the doctrines of the civilians:

In his third book (the first chapter of which is entitled, "What equity rules with respect to Rents levied upon an erroneous title of Property,") he says: "With respect to land possessed upon an erroneous title of property, it is a rule established by the Roman law, and among modern nations, that the true proprietor, asserting his title to the land, has not a claim for the rents levied by the bonæ fidei possessor, and consumed. But though this subject is handled at large, both by the Roman lawyers, and by their commentators, we are left in the dark as to the reason of the rule and of the principle upon which it is founded." * * * *

*If the common law afford to the proprietor a claim for the value of his rents consumed, it must be equity correcting the rigor of the common law, that protects the possessor from this claim; but if the proprietor have not a claim at common law, the possessor has no occasion for equity. The matter, then, is resolvable into the following question: Whether there be or be not a claim at common law. And to this question, which is subtle, we must lend attention." * * * (p. 270, 271, 2d ed.)

Lord Kaimes then proceeds to an investigation of this point, and, at the close of the inquiry, observes: "And thus it comes out clear that there is no action at common law against the bonæ fidei possessor for the value of the fruits he consumes; such an action must resolve itself into a claim of damages, to which the innocent cannot be subjected." * * * (p. 273.)

"But suppose the bonæ fidei possessor to be loquutor by the rents he has levied;" * * *

common law "there is no remedy, for the reason before given, that there is nothing upon which to found an action of reparation of damages in this case, more than where the rents are consumed upon living. But that equity affords an action, is clear; for the maxim, 'quod nemo debet locupletari alienâ jacturâ,' is applicable to this case in the strictest sense." (p. 274.)

By common law, Lord Kaimes evidently must mean the unwritten law of Scotland; since the common law of England has doubtless always afforded some remedy for the recovery of rents and profits, both where the fruits have been consumed, and where the tenant is locupletior. It would indeed strike one that the famous maxim of the Roman law, of which Lord Kaimes has made so judicious a use, viz., "that no one ought to profit by another's loss," is applicable to the case of fruits consumed, not less than to the supposition that the tenant is locupletior. The fruits consumed are certainly gain to the tenant, and loss to the proprietor, quite as much as fruits hoarded up are. But in ordinary cases, it is to be supposed that the tenant is a gainer and locupletior (in Lord Kaimes' sense of the word), and hence the distinction may not be very important; since he allows that equity will grant relief even against a bonæ fidei possessor, in case he be locupletior.

In another place (Book 1, part 1, art. 1), Lord Kaimes considers the case of a bonæ fidei possessor, and the melioration of real property in his possession.

"The title of land-property being intricate, and often uncertain, instances are frequent where a man, in possession of land the property of another, is led, by unavoidable error, to consider it as belonging to himself; his money is bestowed without hesitation in repairing and meliorating the subject." (p. 99.) "Everyone, 13* in that case, must be sensible of *a hardship that requires a remedy; and it must be the wish of every disinterested person, that the bonæ fidei possessor be relieved from this hardship. That the common law affords no relief will be evident at first sight." (p. 98.) But "a court of equity interposes, to oblige the owner to make up the loss, as far as he is locupletior." (p. 99.)

The maxim of the law of England, on this subject, seems to have always been quod caveat emptor. This is the general spirit of the common law doctrine as to the transfer both of personal chattels and of real property. Where there is an outstanding judgment or mortgage, concerning which the purchaser is ignorant, the maxim is applied, so far as the land itself, and the title to it, claimed by persons other than the vendor and vendee. If there be a remedy, then, for the bonæ fidei possessor, it is, as Lord Kaimes observes, only to be found in a resort to a court of equity; and there, as we shall presently see (in the case of Dormer v. Fortescue), the relief will depend upon the evidence of bona fides.

The authorities in the common law of England are numerous and uniform, from the earliest times, in support of the doctrine laid down by the court in the case in the text, concerning rents and profits. "Est autem ista recognitio (says Bracton) sive assisa triplex et pœna multiplex ut infra de restitutione damnorum: Est enim personalis quia persequitur enim, qui fecit disseisinam propter factum quia ipse fecit; persequitur etiam cum ad pœnam propter injuriam; persequitur etiam rem quoad restitutionem et in hoc est rei persecutoria." . . . "Acquiritur vero per assisam istam non solum ipsa res spoliata corporalis verum etiam omnes fructus medio tempore percepti cui competit querela. Item non solum ipsa res sed in ipsa pax et quies. Item non solum pax et quies in proprio, sed libertas et perturbationis evacuatio, de quibus mentio facta est in principio." (Lib. IV. De assisa novæ disseisinæ, Cap. VI.)

Nearly the same thing is to be found in Fleta; take the following citations: "Et quo easu, si talis intrusor teneat se in possessione ejeci poterit impunè vel donator per assisam novæ disseisinæ seisinam suam recuperabit." (Fleta, Lib. III. Cap. 15.)

"Domino vero proprietatis competit remedium versus ejectorem per assisam novæ disseisinæ et perinde recuperabit tenementum dampnâ vero minimè." (Id. L. IV., C. 31.)

And Brooke also, in his abridgement, is equally explicit. "Nota (says he) per asenm justices et sergeants, si disseysor fait feoffment, le disseysie reenter il recouvera son damages per severals briefes de trespass tam vers les feoffees come vers le disseysor et in assyse derent le playntife recouvera tout son damages vers le tenaunt pour xx. ans coment *que il nad [*14 estre tenaunt mes per un moys. (33 Hen. VI., 46.)" (Bro. Abridg. part I, fol. 202, s. 13, tit. Damages.)

The extent to which the principle is carried in this place, is warranted by the statute 6 Edw. I., commonly called the Statute of Gloucester, which enacts (among other things) "that the disseisee shall recover damages in a writ of entry upon novel disseisin, against him that is found tenant after the disseisin." (Vide Plowden, 204.) The statute of Marlbridge (52 Hen. III., c. 16), had before given damages in a writ of mort auncester against the chief lord.

It is also laid down in Brooke's Abridgment, "that if a man disseise me and enfeoff persons unknown, and then retake an estate to himself and ten others, and only two of these ten take the profits, the disseisee shall have an assize against the disseisor, and not against the ten feoffees, for the profits; and it shall be no good plea for the disseisor in this case to say that he received nothing of the rents with the ten others." (See, also, folio 121, b. s. 22, Part II. tit. Pernor de profits et rents; and titles Assize. Disseisor and Disseisin. Trespass.)

Lord Coke says, that "in actions where damages are to be recovered, and the land is the principal" (some hold the opinion), that "the demandant never counteth to damages, and yet shall recover them." "Others doe hold the contrarie." (Co. Litt., 356 a.) And in Mr. Butler's note upon this passage, he says that "Sir Edward Coke, in his commentary upon the statute of Gloucester (2 Inst., 286), observes, that regularly, in personal and mixed actions, damages were to be recovered at common law; but that in real actions no damages were to be recovered at the common law, because the court could not give the demandant that which he demanded not; and the demandant in real actions demands no damages, either by writ or count. The assize was a mixed action, and, therefore, if upon the trial the demandant made out his title, his seisin, and his disseisin, by the tenant, he had judgment to recover his seisin, and his damages for the injury sustained." (Co. Litt., 355 b. Note 1).

It thus appears that, by the old law, damages were formerly recovered by the demandant in a writ of assize. But by the modern law, "the action for mesne profits is consequential to the recovery in ejectment." (Per Lord Mansfield, 2 Burrow, 668.) Undoubtedly, the substitution of the modern action of ejectment, for the assize and the ancient action of ejectment, has produced this change.

In the case of Goodtitle v. Tombs (3 Wils. Rep., 120), Lord Chief Justice Wilmot says: "Before the time of Henry VII., plaintiffs in ejectment did not recover the term, but, until about that time, the mesne profits were the measure of damages. I brnsh out of my mind all 15*] fiction *in an ejectment, the nominal plaintiff, and nominal defendant, the casual ejector—the dramatis personee, or actores fabulae, and consider the recovery by default, or after verdict, as the same thing, viz., a recovery by the lessor of the plaintiff of his term against the tenant in the actual wrongful possession of the land. By the old law of practice, in an action of ejectment (as I said before) you recovered nothing bnt damages—the measure whereof was the mesne profits; no term was recovered. But when it became established that the term should be recovered, the ejectment was lieked into the form of a real action; the proceeding was in rem, and the thing itself—the term only, was recovered, and nominal damages, but not the mesne profits; whereupon, this other mode of recovering the mesne profits, in an action of trespass, was introduced and granted upon the present fiction of ejectment; and I take it that the present action is put in the place of the ejectment at common law, which was, indeed, a true and not a fictitious action, in which the mesne profits only, and not the term, were recovered; for it was no other than a mere action of trespass. You have turned me out of possession, and kept me out ever since the demise laid in the declaration; therefore I desire to be paid the damages to the value of the mesne profits, which I lost thereby; this is just and reasonable." (3 Wilson's Rep., 120. See, also, 2 Dunlap's Practice, 973, 974, 1068, 1069.)

Both in the English practice, and that of the United States, the plaintiff who recovers judgment in ejectment, is entitled to his action for the rents and profits received by the defendant anterior to the time of the demise laid in the ejectment. (3 Bl. Com., 205; Adams' Eject., 329; 2 Dunlap's Prae., 1070.) And the statute of limitations is a bar to a recovery of the rents and profits received beyond six years before the bringing of the action. (Bull. N. P., 88; Hare v. Furey, 3 Yeates' Rep., 13.)

In Van Alen v. Rogers (1 Johns. Cas., 281) it was determined by the Supreme Court of New York that if the tenant has made buildings and other improvements, antecedent to the time when the plaintiff's title accrued, under a contract with the then owner, he will not be allowed for them in an action for the mesne profits, brought by a devisee, bnt must seek his compensation from the personal representatives of the deviser. In the case of Murray v. Gouver- neur (2 Johns. Cas., 441), it is said, by Mr. Justice Kent, that the action for mesne profits is an equitable action, and will allow of every kind of equitable defense; and that a bonae fidei purchaser, without notice, may set-off the value of repairs made upon a house, against the amount of the rents and profits.

It is observed by Mr. Adams, in his valuable treatise on the action of *ejectment, [*16 that it has been said by some, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the mesne profits only from the time he can prove himself to have been in possession; and that, therefore, if a man make his will and die, the devisee will not be entitled to the profits until he has made an actual entry, or in other words, until the day of the demise in ejectment; for that none can have an action for mesne profits, unless in ease of actual entry and possession. Others have held, that when once an entry has been made, it will have relation to the time the title accrued, so as to entitle the claimant to recover the mesne profits from that time; and they say, that if the law were not so, the courts would never have suffered plaintiffs in ejectments to lay their demises back in the manner they now do, and by that means entitle themselves to recover profits, to which they would not otherwise be entitled. The latter seems the better opiuiou; but these antecedent profits are now seldom the subject of litigation, from the practice of laying the demise and ouster immediately after the time when the lessor's title accrues." (Adams' Eject., 334, 335.)

Where a fine, with proclamations, has been levied, an entry to avoid it will not, in the action for mesne profits, entitle the plaintiff to the profits between the time of the fine levied and the time of the entry, although they probably may be recovered in a court of equity. (Compere v. Hicks, 7 Term Rep., 723; Dormer v. Fortescue, 3 Atk., 124.)

And this conducts us from the decisions of the courts of law to those of equity. In the case of Dormer v. Fortescue, referred to in the text, it was decreed that "the defendants should account with the lessor of the plaintiff, Dormer, for all the rents and profits of the estates, from the time when his title first accrued." "I am well satisfied," says Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, "in my opinion upon this case, and that the plaintiff is entitled to the rents from the accrual of his title, and that in this court he has a right to demand them."

* * * "There are several cases where this court will do it" (i. e., decree an account of rents and profits), "and several where they will not; but I can by no means admit the latitude in the anonymous case in 1 Veruon, 105, or, rather, in that note of a case."<sup>1</sup> "For if a man brings an ejectment bill for possession, and an account of rents and profits, where there is no mixture of equity, the court will oblige the plaintiff to make his election to proceed here or at law, and if at law, he must proceed for the whole there." * * "But, *as I said [*17

1—"Where a man is put to his election, whether to proceed at law or in this Court, if the bill be for the land, and to have an account of the mesne profits, he may elect to proceed in an ejectment at law for the possession, and in equity upon the account, because at law he can recover damages for mesne profits from the time only of the entry laid in the declaration." 1 Vern. 105.

before, there are several cases where this court does decree an account of rents and profits, and that from the time the title accrued." * * * In this case, it appears that the settlement under which the plaintiff's title arose was in the hands of the defendants, and detained by them, though I do not say it was fraudulently obtained, but still the plaintiffs could not come at it, without the assistance of this court. The plaintiff, it is true, brought his ejectment before he brought his bill here, and from hence the defendant's counsel have inferred that he knew his title; but how did he know it? Why, only by guess; for it is plain the plaintiff did not so much as know there was this two hundred years' term standing out; for the deed, by which it was created, is not so much as mentioned in the bill, and he only knew it by its being read in the cause." (3 Atk., 124.)

This case affords us also some assistance upon the nature of a bona fide possession, which has been already discussed in the former part of this note.

"It is objected," said Lord Hardwicke, "that where a man is bonæ fidei possessor, he shall not account according to the rule of the civil law; and the rule of this court, and the civil law, is stronger in this respect than the law of England."

"But where a man shall be said to be bonæ fidei possessor, is where the person possessing is ignorant of all the facts and circumstances relating to his adversary's title."

This last interpretation confines the case of bonæ fidei possessor within very narrow limits; and wherever there be color of dispute as to one's title to land, even from the time the title accrues, the tenant must be considered, according to Lord Hardwicke, as a malæ fidei possessor.

[NOTE II.]

TO THE CASE OF HUGHES v. MARYLAND INSURANCE COMPANY, ante, p. 311.

WASHINGTON, J. The question, in this case, is, whether the action is maintainable. The objection to the action of debt, where the penalty is uncertain, is, that this action can only be brought to recover a specific sum of money, the amount of which is ascertained. It is said, that the very sum demanded must be proved; and on a demand for thirty pounds, you can no more recover twenty pounds than you can a 18* horse on a demand <sup>for</sup> a cow. Blackstone says,<sup>1</sup> that debt, in its legal acceptation, is a sum of money due, by certain and express agreement, where the quantity is fixed, and does not depend on any subsequent valuation to settle it; and for non-payment, the proper remedy is the action of debt, to recover the specific sum due. So, if I verbally agree to pay a certain price for certain goods, and fail in the performance, this action lies; for this is a determinate contract. But if I agree for no settled price, debt will not lie, but only a special action on the case; and this action is now generally brought, except in cases of contracts under seal, in preference to the action of debt; because, in this latter action, the plaintiff must prove the whole debt he claims, or recover nothing at all. For the debt is one single cause of action, fixed and determined, and which, if the proof varies from the claim, cannot be looked upon as the same contract of which performance is demanded. If I sue for thirty pounds, I am not at liberty to prove a debt of twenty pounds, and recover a verdict thereon; for I fail in the proof of that contract which my action has alleged to be specific and determinate. But indebitatus assumpsit is not brought to compel a specific performance of the contract, but is to recover damages for its non-performance; and the damages being indeterminate, will adapt themselves to the truth of the case, as it may be proved; for if any debt be proved, it is sufficient.

The doctrine laid down by this writer appears to be much too general and unqualified, although, to a certain extent, it is unquestionably correct. Debt is certainly a sum of money due by contract, and it most frequently is due by a certain and express agreement, which also fixes the sum, independent of any extrinsic circumstances. But it is not essential that the contract should be express, or that it should fix the precise amount of the sum to be paid. Debt may arise on an implied contract, as for the balance of an account stated, to recover back money which a bailiff has paid more than he had received, and in a variety of other cases, where the law, by implication, raises a contract to pay.<sup>2</sup> The sum may not be fixed by the contract, but may depend upon something extrinsic, which may be averred, as a promise to pay so much money as plaintiff shall expend in repairing a ship, may be sued in this form of action, the plaintiff averring that he did expend a certain sum.<sup>3</sup> So on promise by defendant to pay his proportion of the expenses of defending a suit, in which defendant was interested, with an averment that plaintiff had expended so much, and that defendant's pro-

19*] portion amounted to so much.<sup>1</sup> *So, an action of debt may be brought for goods sold to defendant, for so much as they were worth.<sup>2</sup> So, debt will lie for use and occupation, where there is only an implied contract, and no precise sum agreed upon.<sup>3</sup>

Wooddson (3d vol., 95), states that debt will lie for an indeterminate demand, which may readily be reduced to a certainty. In Emery v. Fell (2 Term Rep., 28), in which there was a declaration in debt, containing a number of counts for goods sold and delivered, work and labor, money laid out and expended, and money had and received, the court, on a special demurrer, sustained the action, although it was objected that it did not appear that the demand was certain, and because no contract of sale was stated in the declaration. But the court took no notice of the first objection, and avoided the second, by implying a contract of sale, from the words which stated the sale. These cases prove that debt may be maintained upon an implied as well as upon an express contract, although no precise sum is agreed upon. But the doctrine stated by Lord Mansfield, in the case of Walker v. Witter (Douglass, 6), is conclusive upon this point. He lays it down that debt may be brought for a sum capable of being ascertained, though not ascertained at the time the action was brought. Ashurst and Buller say that whenever indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable, debt is also. In this case two points were also made by the defendant's counsel; first, that on the plea of nil debet the plaintiff could not have judgment, because debt could not be maintained on a foreign judgment; and second, that the one plea of nil tiel record, judgment could not be entered for the plaintiff, because the judgment in Jamaica was not on record. The court were in favor of the defendant on the second point, and against him in the first, by deciding that debt could not be maintained on a foreign judgment, because indebitatus assumpsit might; and that the uncertainty of the debt demanded in the declaration was no objection to the bringing of an action of debt. The decision, therefore, given upon that point, was upon the very point on which the cause turned. But, independent of the opinion given in this case, is it not true, to use the words of Buller, "that all the old cases show, that whenever indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable, debt also lies." The subject is very satisfactorily explained by Lord Loughborough, in the case of Rudder v. Price,<sup>4</sup> which was an action of debt, brought on a promissory note, payable by installments, before the last day of payment was past, in which the court, yielding to the weight of authority, rather than to the reason which governed it, decided that the action could not be supported, because the 20*] contract, being entire, would *admit of but one action, which could not be brought until the last payment had become due, although indebitatus assumpsit might have been brought. But his lordship was led to inquire into the ancient forms of action on contracts, and he states that in ancient times debt was the common action for goods sold, and for work and labor done. Where assumpsit was brought, it was not a general indebitatus assumpsit; for it was not brought merely on a promise, but a special damage for a non-feasance, by which a special action arose to the plaintiff. The action of assumpsit, to recover general damages for the non-performance of a contract, was first introduced by Slade's case, which course was afterwards followed. In the case of Walker v. Witter, Buller also stated, that till Slade's case, a notion prevailed, that on a simple contract for a certain sum, the action must be debt; but it was held in that case that the plaintiff might bring assumpsit or debt, at his election.

Thus it appears, that in all cases of contracts, unless a special damage was stated, the primitive action was debt, and that the action of indebitatus assumpsit succeeded, principally, I presume, to avoid the wager of law, which, in Slade's case, was one of the main arguments urged by the defendant's counsel against allowing the introduction of the action of assumpsit, as it thereby deprived the defendant of his privilege of wagering his law. Buller seems, therefore, to have been well warranted, in the case of Walker v. Witter, in saying that all the old cases show, that where indebitatus assumpsit will lie, debt will lie. The same doctrine is supported by the case of Emery v. Fell,<sup>6</sup> which was an action of debt, in which all the counts of indebitatus assumpsit are stated, where the objection to the doctrine was made and overruled. So, in the case of Harris v. Jameson,<sup>7</sup> Ashurst refers, with approbation, to the opinion delivered in the case of Walker v. Witter. That debt may be brought for foreign money, the value of which the jury are to find, had been decided before the case of Walker v. Witter, as appears in the case of Rands v. Peck,<sup>8</sup> and in Draper v. Rastal, the same action was brought, though in different ways, for current money, being the value of the foreign.

Comyns, in his Digest, tit. Debt, p. 366, where he enumerates the cases in which debt will not lie, states no exception to the rule, that where indebitatus assumpsit will lie, debt will lie, but one, for the interest of money due upon a loan. But the reason of that is explained by Lord Loughborough, in the case of Rudder v. Price, who states that until the case of Cook v. Whorwood, upon a covenant to pay a stipulated sum by installments, *if [*21 the plaintiff brought assumpsit, after the first failure, he was entitled to recover the whole sum in damages, because he could not, in that form of action, any more than in the action of debt, support two actions on an entire contract. Until that decision, the only difference between debt and assumpsit, in such a case, was, that the former could not be brought until after the last installment was due; and in the latter, though it might be brought after the first failure, yet the plaintiff might recover the whole, because he could not maintain a second action on the same contract.

I proceed with the doctrine of Judge Blackstone, before stated. After stating what constitutes debt, he observes "that the remedy is an action of debt, to recover the special sum due." It is observable, that he does not say that the plaintiff is to recover the sum demanded by his declaration, and no person will deny but that he is to recover the special sum due.

After stating what constitutes a debt, and prescribing the remedy, Judge Blackstone proceeds to the evidence and recovery, and says "the plaintiff must prove the whole debt he claims, or he can recover nothing." On this account he adds, "the action of assumpsit is most commonly brought; because, in that, it is sufficient if the plaintiff prove any debt to be due, to enable him to recover the sum, so proved, in damages." If this writer merely means to say that where a special contract is laid in the declaration, it must be proved as laid, the doctrine will not be controverted. If debt be brought on a written agreement, the contract produced in evidence must correspond, in all respects, with that stated in the declaration, and any variance will be fatal to the plaintiff's recovery. Such, too, is the law in all special actions in the case; but if Judge Blackstone meant to say that in every case where debt is brought on a simple contract, the plaintiff must prove the whole debt as claimed by the declaration, or that he can recover nothing, he is opposed by every decision, ancient and modern. The old cases, before mentioned, in which debt was brought and sustained, are all cases where it is impossible to suppose that the sum stated in the declaration was or could in every instance be proved, any more than it is or can be proved in actions of indebitatus assumpsit. They are, in fact, actions substantially like to actions of indebitatus assumpsit in the form of action for debt. The action of debt for foreign money, is and can be for no determinate sum; because the value must be found by the jury, either upon the trial of the issue, or upon a writ of inquiry, where there is judgment by default.<sup>1</sup>

22*] *The case of Sanders v. Mark is debt for an uncertain sum, in which the debt claimed was for fifteen pounds eighteen shillings and sixpence, and the defendant's proportion of the whole sum was averred to be fifteen pounds eighteen shillings and eight pence; yet the action was supported. This is plainly a case where the sum due could not be certainly averred; because the yearly value of the defendant's property might not be known to the plaintiff, and could only be ascertained, with certainty, by the jury. In the case of Walker v. Witter, Lord Mansfield is express upon this point. He says that debt may be brought for a sum capable of being ascertained, though not ascertained at the time of bringing the action; and he adds, that it is not necessary that the plaintiff should recover the exact sum demanded. In the case of Rudder v. Price, Lord Loughborough, who has shed more light upon this subject than any other judge, says, "that long before Slade's case, the demand in an action of debt must have been for a thing certain in its nature; yet it was by no means necessary that the amount should be set out so precisely that less could not be recovered."

In short, if, before Slade's case, debt was the common action for goods sold, and work done, it is more obvious that it was not thought necessary to state the amount due, with such precision, as that less could not be recovered; for, in those cases, as the same judge observes, "the sum due was to be ascertained by a jury, and was given in the form of damages." But yet the demand was for a thing certain in its nature; that is, it was capable of being ascertained, though not ascertained, or perhaps capable of being so, when the action was brought. Whence the opinion arose, that in an action of debt on a simple contract, the whole sum must be proved, I cannot ascertain. It certainly was not, and could not be the doctrine prior to Slade's case; and it is clear that it was not countenanced by that case. However, let the opinion have originated how it might, Lord Loughborough, in the above case, denominates it an erroneous opinion, and says that it has been some time since corrected.

In the case of M'Quillen v. Coxe, the sum demanded was five thousand pounds; which was fifty more than appeared to be due by the different sums. The objection was made on a special demurrer, that the declaration demanded more than appeared by the plaintiff's own showing to be due. The court did not notice the alleged variance between the writ and declaration, or the misrecital of the writ; but overruled the demurrer, because the plaintiff might, in an action of debt on a simple contract, prove and recover a less sum than he demanded in the writ.

From this last expression it might be supposed that the court meant *to distinguish [23] between the sum demanded by the writ, and that demanded by the declaration; but this could not have been the case, because the sum demanded by the writ, and that demanded by the declaration, was the same viz., five thousand pounds. There was, in fact, no variance; for, though the declaration recites the writ, yet the sum demanded, and which the declaration declared to be the sum which the defendant owed and detained, was the same sum as that mentioned in the writ; and the objection stated in the special demurrer, was made to the variance between the sum demanded by the declaration, and the sum alleged to be due.

The distinction taken in the case of Ingleton v. Cripps,<sup>2</sup> runs through all the above cases, and appears to be perfectly rational—viz., that where debt is brought on a covenant, to pay a sum certain, any variance of the sum in the deed will vitiate. But where the deed relates to matter of fact extrinsic, there, though the plaintiff demanded more than is due, he may enter a remitter for the balance. This shows that debt may be brought for more than is due, and that the jury may give less; or, if they give more than is due, the error may be corrected by a remitter.

Thus stands the doctrine in relation to the action of debt on contracts; and if debt will lie on a contract, where the sum demanded is uncertain, it would seem to follow that it would lie for a penalty given by statute, which is uncertain, and dependent upon the amount to be assessed by a jury; for, when they have assessed it, the sum so fixed becomes the amount of the penalty given. This, however, stands upon stronger ground than mere analogy. The point is expressly decided in the case of Pemberton v. Shelton.<sup>1</sup> That was an action of debt, brought upon the first section of the statute, 2 Ed. VI., ch. 13, which gives the treble value of the tithes due, for not setting them out. The declaration claimed thirty-three pounds, as the treble value; and, in setting forth the value of the tithes, the whole amount appeared to be more than one-third of the sum demanded; so that the plaintiff claimed less than the penalty given by the statute. Upon nil debet pleaded, the jury found for the plaintiff twenty pounds, and a motion was made in arrest of judgment, for the reason above mentioned. The court overruled the motion, upon the ground afterwards laid down in the case of Ingledon v. Cripps. They held that there was a difference when the action of debt is grounded on a specialty, or contract, which is a sum uncertain; or upon a statute, which gives a certain sum for the penalty; and where it is grounded on a demand, when the 24*] sum is uncertain, being such *as shall be given by the jury. In the former, it was agreed that the plaintiff cannot demand less than the sum agreed to be paid or given by the statute;

1.—Randall's Peake.

2.—2 Lord Raym. 815; Salk. 659.

but in the latter, it is said that if the declaration varies from the real sum, it is not material; for he shall not recover according to his demand in the declaration, but according to the verdict and judgment which may be given for the plaintiff. It cannot be said that this doctrine was laid down in consequence of the court considering this as a statutory action, to which it was necessary to accommodate the recovery, by changing general principles of law applicable to other cases; for it will appear, by a reference to the statute, that it prescribes no remedy for enforcing the penalty; and that debt was brought upon the common law principle that where a statute gives a penalty, debt may be brought to recover it. In this case, the statute gives the action of debt, and I cannot perceive in what other form, than this one which has been adopted, the declaration could have been drawn. Had it claimed the smallest sum, it might have been less than the jury might have thought the United States entitled to recover; and yet, judgment could not have been given for more. I know of no precedent for a declaration in debt, claiming no precise sum to be due and detained, nor any principle of law, which would sanction such a form. On the other hand, I find abundant authority for saying that the demand of one sum does not prevent the recovery of a smaller sum, where it is diminished by extrinsic circumstances.

Jones*, 68 Ala. 55, where improvements were made by trespasser and in mala fide; Hawke v. Deffebach, 4 Dak. 40, 22 N. W. 490; also, Woodhull v. Rosenthal, 61 N. Y. 397, where improvements were not made in good faith; Ross v. Irving, 14 Ill. 177; Armstrong v. Jackson, 1 Blackf. 375, and Webster v. Stewart, 6 Iowa, 403, on statutory grounds; Strike v. McDonald, 2 Harr. & G. 225, 227, 1 Bland Ch. 76, 78, where improvements were made by one conscious of defect in title. Distinguished in Laible v. Ferry, 32 N. J. Eq. 801, where claimants extended credit to party whom they knew had no authority to bind trust property; Worthington v. Young, 8 Ohio, 404, where attempt was made to set off value of improvements against claim for rents, under lease providing tenant might remove improvements at expiration of term; Effinger v. Hall, 81 Va. 102, and Dawson v. Grow, 29 W. Va. 337, 1 S. E. 567, improvements made with notice of defect in title. Modified, Ewing's Heirs v. Handley, 4 Litt. 371, and Pugh v. Bell, 2 T. B. Mon. 129, 15 Am. Dec. 147, holding value of improvements is not always restricted to amount of rents charged.

Constitutional law.—Any law which enlarges, abridges, or in any manner changes the intention of parties, resulting from stipulations in the contract, necessarily impairs it, and to that extent is void, p. 84.

The following citing cases affirm and apply this principle: Schuster v. Weiss, 114 Mo. 174, 21 S. W. 443, 19 L. R. A. 187, liability of surety changed by enlarging contract of principal; Berdan v. Van Riper, 16 N. J. L. 11, holding an act respecting estates of joint tenancy does not affect estates created before its adoption; dissenting opinion, State v. Mathews, 3 Jones (N. C.), 464, holding an act making it an indictable offense to pass bank bills of certain denominations impairs contract authorizing bank to issue bills of that denomination; Goodale v. Fennell, 27 Ohio St. 432, 22 Am. Rep. 326, where, after municipality under general statute had contracted for improvements, its power of taxation was restricted; Knighton v. Burns, 10 Or. 551, App., holding a law permitting debts to be cancelled in currency known as "scrip," is void as to debts contracted before its enactment; Western Fund Society v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. St. 182, 72 Am. Dec. 734, where principle was applied to acts of municipality which impaired its contracts; Goggans v. Turnipseed, 1 S. C. 82, 98 Am. Dec. 398, holding statute providing creditor might charge specified interest on open accounts, is invalid as to contracts made before its passage; Taylor v. Stearns, 18 Gratt. 274, where statute stayed collection of debts for a limited period; Bank v. McVeigh, 20 Gratt. 465, where place of payment was changed by law; Homestead Cases. 22 Gratt. 288, 292, 12 Am. Rep. 515, 518, where statute increased amount of property exempt as a homestead; State v. Commissioners, 4 Wis. 418, where conditions under which purchases of school lands might be made were changed. Cited in In re Kennedy, 2 S. C. 222, but holding a homestead exemption law is not void as to contracts made before its adoption. See also note on general subject, 10 Am. Dec. 135, 136.

Constitutional law.— A statute which so changes the nature and extent of remedies on a contract as to impair the right, is to that extent void, and it is immaterial that the extent of the change in the contract is slight, pp. 75, 84.

This principle is applied in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 316, 317, 11 L. 145, 149, case of a statute affecting mortgagee's foreclosure rights; Planters' Bank v. Sharp, 6 How. 327, 330, 332, 12 L. 458, 459, 460, where right of bank to collect notes was impaired; Curran v. State, 15 How. 319, 14 L. 712, where State was made preferred creditor of bank, leaving, in effect, no remedy to other creditors; Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. 550, 552, 18 L. 408, 409, and United States v. New Orleans, 17 Fed. 488, where statute restricted municipality's powers of taxation, thereby rendering it unable to pay its outstanding bonds; Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 601, 604, 24 L. 796, 797, where statute increasing amount of property exempt from execution was enacted subsequent to contraction of debt; Barnitz v. Beverly, 163 U. S. 123, 41 L. 98, 16 S. Ct. 1044, holding a statute authorizing redemption after foreclosure, when no such right existed at time contract was made, is void as to such contracts; Nelson v. McCrary, 60 Ala. 310, where statute enlarged homestead exemptions; Edwards v. Williamson, 70 Ala. 152, holding statute relating to collection of taxes, which operated to impair a State's contracts with its creditors, to be inoperative; Jacoway v. Denton, 25 Ark.

641, where State Constitution cut off all remedy on contracts for sale of slaves; Cohn v. Hoffman, 45 Ark. 385, holding exemption in Constitution as to homestead has no application to debts contracted before its adoption; McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 30, holding statute requiring claims against State to be approved by board of examiners has no application to claims matured before its enactment; dissenting opinion, Cutts v. Hardee, 38 Ga. 385, where statute permitted evidence to be introduced to attack consideration as to certain contracts made before passage of act; Lott v. Dysart, 45 Ga. 361, where statute imposed certain conditions as to payment of taxes which must be complied with before courts would render assistance to enforce contract; Fisher v. Green, 142 Ill. 94, 31 N. E. 176, where statute operated to deprive mortgagee of right to have property sold under power of sale, and without redemption; Martindale v. Moore, 3 Blackf. 281, holding statute providing misleading should not render executor personally liable, does not have retroactive effect; Berry v. Ransdall, 4 Met. (Ky.) 294, where legislature sought to limit time for bringing actions, regardless of time when right of action accrued; Collins v. Collins, 79 Ky. 90, 92, applying rule to statute affecting redemptions of real estate sold under order of court; Sabatier v. Creditors, 6 Mart. (La.) (N. S.) 591; also, Lessley v. Phipps, 49 Miss. 799, where amount of exempt property was increased; Rowlett v. Shepherd, 4 La. 94, where statute compelled debtor to pay interest on certain contingency; dissenting opinion, Doughty v. Sheriff, 27 La. Ann. 360, holding statute exempting property from execution has no application to cases where debt was contracted before its passage; Phinney v. Phinney, 81 Me. 461, 10 Am. St. Rep. 269, 17 Atl. 407, 4 L. R. A. 350, and n., time for redemption extended; Cargill v. Power, 1 Mich. 371, where time for redemption was shortened; Coffman v. Bank of Kentucky, 40 Miss. 33, 90 Am. Dec. 314, where "stay laws" operated to take away all remedies for period of two years; Leavitt v. Lovering, 64 N. H. 609, 1 L. R. A. 59, statute providing all payments made within three months before assignment for benefit of creditors shall be void, does not apply to payments of existing contracts; Moore v. State, 43 N. J. L. 206, 39 Am. Rep. 561, where statute operated to create liability which had been barred by statute of limitations; State v. Carew, 13 Rich. 511, 91 Am. Dec. 250, where statute operated to stay execution; State v. Bank, 1 S. C. 78, where act withdrew property of debtor from operation of legal process of creditor; State v. Cardozo, 8 S. C. 81, 28 Am. Rep. 284, where statute diverted money from a fund which State had pledged for payment of its bonds; Nelson v. Allen, 1 Yerg. 383, holding statute allowing defendant in ejectment the value of improvements made upon land, void; Grasmeyer v. Beeson, 13 Tex. 530, where statute took away all remedy; Swinburne v. Mills, 17 Wash. 618, 61 Am. St. Rep. 936, 50 Pac. 491, case of statute requiring a year's stay of sale under foreclosure decree, and requiring sale to bring within 80 per cent. of appraised valuation, there having been no such law at time mortgage was given; Peninsular, etc. v. Union Oil Co., 100 Wis. 492, 76 N. W. 361, 42 L. R. A. 332, and Sec., etc., Bk. v. Schranck, 97 Wis. 262, 73 N. W. 35, 39 L. R. A. 575, act enabling debtor by assignment of his property to defeat a levy thereon made within ten days, is invalid as to pre-existing contracts.

Other citing cases affirm the syllabus principle without being called upon especially to apply it: Lavin v. Emigrant Bank, 18 Blatchf. 16, 1 Fed. 655, as bearing on question of what constitutes "due process of law;" Limestone County v. Rather, 48 Ala. 447, affirming rule; Thorne v. San Francisco, 4 Cal. 142, quære, whether suspension of remedies, or any part thereof, existing when contract was made, does not impair obligation of contract; Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 10, holding a remedial statute which operates to take away a right is void. Cited generally in dissenting opinion, Aycock v. Martin, 37 Ga. 179, involving constitutionality of "stay laws." Affirming rule generally, without specially applying it, Bruce v. Schuyler, 4 Gilm. 277, 46 Am. Dec. 459; dissenting opinion, Scobey v. Gibson, 17 Ind. 578; dissenting opinion, Kennebec Ry. Co. v. Portland Ry. Co., 59 Me. 73. Approved in Grimes v. Bryne, 2 Minn. 96, although the case holds an exemption law intended to operate on debts contracted before its passage, operates only on remedy and is constitutional; also, King v. Hopkins, 57 N. H. 353, 354. Cited generally, without special application of the principle, in McLaren v. Pennington, 1 Paige Ch. 108; in dissenting opinion, People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 563; *Eakin v. Power coupled with interest.—To constitute, there must be an interest in the thing itself and not merely in the execution of the power, p. 204.

The citations collect a large number of authorities affirming and applying this doctrine, as follows: Walker v. Walker, 125 U. S. 342, 31 L. 772, 8 S. Ct. 931, affirming S. C., 88 Mo. 284, holding statute conferring authority to prosecute claims of State against United States and receive a percentage of amount collected for services does not create power coupled with interest so that power is irrevocable; Lockett v. Hill, 1 Woods, 558, 9 Bank. Reg. 178, F. C. 8,443; Lathrop v. Brown, 60 Ga. 315, holding under laws of Georgia a power of sale in a mortgage is not a power coupled with an interest; Or. & Wash. Bank v. Mortgage Co., 13 Sawy. 265, 35 Fed. 25, where power to loan principal's money and to collect the interest thereon and to retain commission for services was held not coupled with an interest; Kahn v. Weill, 14 Sawy. 514, 42 Fed. 712, where power was given to manage and sell lands; Stier v. Insurance Co., 58 Fed. 845, and Insurance Co. v. Williams, 91 N. C. 72, 49 Am. Rep. 638, holding right of insurance agent to commissions on renewal policies does not make his agency an agency coupled with an interest; Johnson Signal Co. v. Union Switch Co., 59 Fed. 22, where appointment making claimant sole agent with power to develop business and negotiate sale thereof was held to create no interest; China Ins. Co. v. Ward, 59 Fed. 714, 20 U. S. App. 292, holding ship's general agent has, presumptively, no maritime or equitable lien or insurable interest in the vessel; Hall v. Gambrell, 88 Fed. 711, holding power to sell land, authorizing agent to retain part of purchase money as compensation for his services, not coupled with an interest.

State court citing cases rely upon this definition as follows: Chambers v. Leay, 73 Ala. 378, holding, under power to sell land, agreement to give agent share of proceeds as commission does not give him an interest in land; Yeates v. Pryor, 11 Ark. 77, 78, power to locate floating timber claims and to sell and give title thereto cannot be executed after death of principal; Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 309, 310, 11 Pac. 825, 826, holding power to sell real estate gives no interest therein unless agent may execute power in his own name; Norton v. Whitehead, 84 Cal. 268, 271, 18 Am. St. Rep. 176, 177, 24 Pac. 155, 156, holding assignment of accruing moneys, with power to collect, gives assignee power coupled with interest; Darrow v. Equity.— Courts of, will afford relief in cases of fraud or mistake in facts, p. 211.

Principle approved and followed in Walden v. Skinner, 101 U. S. 584, 25 L. 966, where irregularities in conveyance executed by trustee were corrected in order to carry out purpose of trust; Rogers v. Atkinson, 1 Ga. 25, holding, where instrument is drawn to carry into effect oral agreement and which, by mistake of draughtsman, in fact or in law, does not fulfill intention of parties, equity will correct mistake; Stafford v. Fetters, 55 Iowa, 487, 8 N. W. 324, where blank indorsement intended to be without recourse was so construed; Miller v. Aldrich, 31 Mich. 420, where stipulation in mortgage, that mortgagor would keep premises insured for mortgagee's benefit, was held binding on all others who stood in mortgagor's place with notice; Massie v. Pray, 4 Ohio, 192, 19 Am. Dec. 600. See valuable note in 65 Am. St. Rep. 481, 482, 487, 492, on reformation of contracts.

Distinguished in Tilghman v. Tilghman, Bald. 492, F. C. 14,045, where there was neither fraud nor mistake of facts, but owing to circumstances not provided for, contract would not carry out intent of parties; Burke v. Anderson, 40 Ga. 538, limiting rule to original parties and their privies in estate or in law.

Mistake of law.— Although it seems not to be decided by any case that mistake of law may be relieved against, on the other hand, there is no case holding it may not, p. 215.

The following cases cite this case as authority for holding equity may relieve from such mistake: Wyche v. Greene, 16 Ga. 59, where instrument intended as a deed of gift was corrected so as to conform to intent of parties; Nowlin v. Pyne, 47 Iowa, 295, where writing failed to express in apt and proper terms real intention of parties; Underwood v. Brockman, 4 Dana, 316, 29 Am. Dec. 413, where party, under misapprehension of law, compromised fraudulent claim; Lammot v. Bowly, 6 Harr. & J. 525; Griffith v. Townley, 69 Mo. 19, 33 Am. Rep. 481, and Lowndes v. Chisholm, 2 McCord Eq. 463, 16 Am. Dec. 670, all holding where purchaser and vendor both supposed fee was being sold, when in fact equity of redemption only passed, equity will afford purchaser relief; Mellon v. Webster, 5 Mo. App. 454, where a layman in dealing with a lawyer manifestly did just contrary to what was intended; Green v. Morris, 12 N. J. Eq. 170, where mistake was made by agent of party who afterwards sought to take advantage of it; Moreland v. Atchison, 19 Tex. 309, where one party, having superior knowledge of law, took advantage of another, who was confessedly ignorant thereof; Shear

v. Robinson, 18 Fla. 468; Oliver v. Pray, 4 Ohio, 194, 19 Am. Dec. 602, making no application of this principle; Evants v. Administrator, 11 Ohio, 487, 38 Am. Dec. 745, where an instrument, through mutual mistake of parties as to legal effect of terms used, failed to carry out their intention; Wilson v. Ott, 173 Pa. St. 260, 51 Am. St. Rep. 769, 34 Atl. 26, affirming rule that equity will relieve against mistake of law; also Lawrence v. Beaubien, 2 Bail, 652, 23 Am. Dec. 162, holding it immaterial that parties were correctly informed as to the facts; Stone v. Brown, 16 Tex. 430, holding where party through ignorance of the law, failed to present will for probate within statutory time, right to letters was not forfeited; Green Bay Co. v. Hewitt, 62 Wis. 334, 21 N. W. 221, and Kyle v. Fehley, 81 Wis. 71, 29 Am. St. Rep. 868, 51 N. W. 259, where error in deed, arising from mistake in law, was corrected; *Kearney v. Va. 477, able discussion of general subject.

The principal case is cited also in the following as bearing upon this subject: Snell v. Insurance Co., 98 U. S. 90, 25 L. 55, holding mere mistake of law constitutes no ground for reformation of contract; Culbreath v. Culbreath, 7 Ga. 69, 74, 50 Am. Dec. 379, 383, holding money paid under mistake of law may be recovered, but not so if paid under ignorance of law; Freeman v. Curtis, 51 Me. 143, 81 Am. Dec. 567, where equity decreed a reconveyance of realty, conveyance having been made under mistake of fact arising from ignorance of law; Sparks v. Pittman, 51 Miss. 521, equity will afford relief from mistake of law where, through misapprehension of, deed fails to effectuate agreement; Champlin v. Laytin, 18 Wend. 414, 423, 31 Am. Dec. 386, 394; McNaughten v. Partridge, 11 Ohio. 234, 38 Am. Dec. 734, and *Ellis v. Divisible contracts.—Where the acts stipulated to be done are to be done at different times, the covenants are to be construed as independent of each other, p. 224.

Cited and principle applied in Loud v. Pomona Water Co., 153 U. S. 578, 38 L. 828, 14 S. Ct. 932, where payment or tender of payment of purchase-price of land was held a condition precedent to the right to compel conveyance; Railroad Co. v. Parks, 86 Tenn. 562, 8 S. W. 845, agreement to pay subscription to stock when road reached county line held independent of agreement to build depot at particular point in county, although building depot was condition precedent to payment of final installment. Cited generally in McSherry v. Brooks, 46 Md. 122. See note, 59 Am. St. Rep. 279.

Qualified in Green v. Town of Dyersburg, 2 Flipp. 499, F. C. 5,756, holding the rule yields to manifest contrary intent and that building of railroad and payment of municipal bonds in aid therefor were dependent covenants.

Contracts.—Where party to contract agrees to pay a specified amount in some particular article, if, upon demand, he refuses to deliver the article, he loses the benefit of that part of contract, p. 227.

Cited and applied in Cook v. Stevenson, 30 Mich. 248, where vendee agreed to give security for part of purchase price, on failure to do so it was held he lost the right.

Contracts.—Acts to be done by both parties at the same time are deemed mutual and concurrent covenants, p. 224.

Cited to this point in Tilghman v. Tilghman, 1 Bald. 494, F. C. 14,045, holding party who claims remedy for nonperformance must aver and prove performance, or offer and readiness to perform; to same effect, Neir v. Yocum, 9 Sawy. 25, 16 Fed. 170, where one party had agreed to sell and deliver hops to another on demand and upon payment of certain price.

Attachment.—Under Maryland law an attachment will not lie in a case ex contractu for unliquidated damages for the nondelivery of goods, p. 227.

Principle applied in State v. Steibel, 31 Md. 37, in construction of statute permitting action against surety on guardian's bond.

Attachment.—Under Maryland practice, if defendant appears in attachment proceedings for purpose of dissolving attachment, plaintiff cannot be required to file a new declaration, p. 226.

This practice is approved and followed in Spear v. Griffin, 23 Md. 429.

8 Wheat. 229-252, 5 L. 603, SEXTON v. WHEATON.

Fraudulent conveyance.—Acts of grantee will not be considered fraudulent unless one complaining thereof knew of the acts and has been actually defrauded thereby, p. 238.

Principle applied with approval in Magniac v. Thompson, 1 Bald. 357, 359, 364, F. C. 8,956, holding both parties to alleged act of fraud must concur in illegal design and that time intervening between conveyance and contraction of debt is not a matter which makes conveyance per se a fraud; to same effect, Ashby v. Steere, 2 Wood. & M. 357, F. C. 576, and Stockley v. Horsey, 4 Houst. 614; S. C., 4 Del. Ch. 550, where case is cited in quotation from Magniac v. Thompson, supra; Lyman v. Cessford, 15 Iowa, 233, where grantee failed to have deeds recorded, but it was not shown creditors were aware of this fact; Marston v. Dresen, 85 Wis. 542, 55 N. W. 900, where husband, being indebted, conveyed legal title to wife who had equitable, it not appearing credit was given husband on such title, held, conveyance was valid as to them.

Fraudulent conveyances.—Owner of property may make any disposition of it which does not interfere with existing rights of others, p. 242.

This principle is applied in Harkins v. Bailey, 48 Ala. 378, holding bona fide sale of property by insolvent to a relation will not be set aside; Marsh v. Richardson, 49 Ala. 433, and Lawson v. Warehouse Co., 73 Ala. 292, only limitation on this power is that prescribed by statute; Lyles v. Cements, 49 Ala. 449, applying principle to married woman in management of her separate estate; Rowland v. Plummer, 50 Ala. 196, in determining legality of loan made by wife to husband; Braune v. McGee, 50 Ala. 362, where property of intended wife was conveyed by antenuptial settlement to trustee to hold for her separate use during coverture; Crawford v. Kirksey, 50 Ala. 595, affirming right of insolvent debtor to make conveyance of property to one creditor in satisfaction of debts owed him; Holleman v. De Nyse, 51 Ala. 99, conveyance by husband to wife and children; Sims v. Rickets, 35 Ind. 187, 9 Am. Rep. 683, where husband, free from debt and without children, conveyed to wife; Wilder v. Brooks, 10 Minn. 54, 57, 88 Am. Dec. 50, 53, voluntary settlement on wife. Approved in Cosby v. Ross, 3 J. J. Marsh. 290, 20 Am. Dec. 140, conveyance without consideration, but there was no allegation of fraud; Miller v. Miller, 17 Or. 434, 21 Pac. 942, holding further as to interest husband retains in property voluntarily settled on wife.

Fraudulent conveyances.—Statute 13 Eliz. c. 5., avoids all conveyances not made on a consideration deemed valuable in law, as against previous creditors, p. 242.

Cited and statute followed in McLaughlin v. Bank, 7 How. 228, 12 L. 679, holding a note not yet due is sufficient to constitute holder a creditor within rule; Parish v. Murphree, 13 How. 100, 14 L. 68, where debtor made voluntary settlement on his wife; Clements v. Moore, 6 Wall. 313, 18 L. 789, where conveyance was made to wife indirectly through third person; Kehr v. Smith, 20 Wall. 35, 36, 22 L. 315, affirming decision, same case, 2 Dill. 59, 60, F. C. 13,071, where settlement was made while debts existed and was held to be out of all proportion to means of husband; Bean v. Patterson, 122 U. S. 499, 30 L. 1127, 7 S. Ct. 1299, holding where wife is one of husband's creditors, a conveyance made to her will be deemed to have been made for valuable consideration; Miller v. Thompson, 3 Port. 207, and whether void as to subsequent creditors depends on intent with which conveyance was made; Hoot v. Sorrell, 11 Ala. 398, and Wright v. Campbell, 27 Ark. 645, where voluntary trust deed was held void as to creditors; Arnett v. Coffey, 1 Colo. Distinguished, Emery v. Yount, 7 Colo. 109, 1 Pac. 688, where pleading contained no allegation that conveyance was made with intent to defraud; May v. May, 19 Fla. 387, payments of premiums on life insurance policy by insolvent is not fraudulent as to subsequent creditors; Pepper v. Carter, 11 Mo. 544, holding voluntary conveyance, even if grantor be embarrassed by debts, is not void as to subsequent creditors unless actual fraud be shown; Grimes v. Sherman, 25 Neb. 846, 847, 41 N. W. 815, holding, under facts, no intent to defraud was shown; Martin v. Oliver, 9 Humph. 566, 49 Am. Dec. 718, holding facts that husband conveyed nearly all his property to his wife and subsequently became indebted without means to pay, does not show fraudulent intent.

Fraudulent conveyance.—A voluntary settlement in favor of a wife and children is not to be impeached by subsequent creditors, on the ground of its being voluntary, p. 250.

Principle applied in Mattingly v. Nye, 8 Wall. 372, 19 L. 381, where settlement was made three years previous to contraction of debt; Jackson v. Jackson, 91 U. S. 125, 23 L. 259, where husband attempted to have settlement set aside; Smith v. Vodges, 92 U. S. 183, 23 L. 481, debt contracted subsequent to settlement; Jones v. Clifton, 101 U. S. 227, 25 L. 909, where it was held small debts owed at time of settlement, such debts being subsequently paid, would not avoid settlement; Schreyer v. Scott, 134 U. S. 410, 33 L. 958, 10 S. Ct. 581, settlement made prior to contraction of debts and not in contemplation of defrauding subsequent creditors; Garner v. Bank, 151 U. S. 434, 38 L. 224, 14 S. Ct. 395, holding further, where husband while managing wife's separate estate, without her knowledge invests a part in real estate, taking title in his name, and she, on discovering this fact, compels a conveyance of title to herself, her equity in the property will be considered superior to that of his creditors; *Dick v. Bills and notes.— Demand of payment, and notice of nonpayment, need not be made by a notary public in the case of promissory notes, in order to bind indorser, p. 331.

Followed in Nelson v. Bank, 69 Fed. 800, 32 U. S. App. 554, holding, all that is required is that due presentment and demand shall be made, and that indorser shall be seasonably notified of dishonor, and holder looks to him for payment; Bay v. Church, 15 Conn. 17, 18, where note was payable in one State and indorser was inhabitant of another; Bond v. Bragg, 17 Ill. 71, holding further, protest, of itself, is not evidence of demand of payment, nonpayment and notice, of promissory note; Kaskaskia Bridge Co. v. Shannon, 1 Gilm. 24, applying rule to inland bill of exchange; Smith v. Little, 10 N. H. 532; Sussex Bank v. Baldwin, 17 N. J. L. 489, where demand was made by one not a notary. Criticised in Bank v. Cooper, 1 Harr. 16, as making the notary judge of what is legal notice.

Evidence.—Memoranda of acts done, made in the ordinary course of business, and in discharge of prescribed duty, are admissible evidence of such acts in the event of the maker's death, p. 337.

The following citing cases affirm and apply this rule: Gale v. Norris, 2 McLean, 471, F. C. 5,190, applying rule to entries in merchants' book of account made by clerk, since deceased; Hatfield v. Perry, 4 Harr. 465, a case almost identical in fact; Spann v. Baltzell, 1 Fla. 321, 46 Am. Dec. 360, where entries made by a notary, authenticated by his oath, were admitted in evidence, although he could not remember the facts stated in such entries; *Robinson v. Federal courts.—In action in United States Circuit Court it is not necessary to aver on the record that defendant is an inhabitant of the district, or was found therein at time of serving writ, p. 699.

Rule cited and followed in Feese v. Phelps, 1 McAll. 17, F. C. 13,818, if allegations show diverse citizenship that is sufficient; McCloskey v. Cobb, 2 Bond, 17, F. C. 8,702. Principle applied to action in State court, Hall v. Mobley, 13 Ga. 319, holding it is not indispensable to aver residence of defendant in county where suit is brought.

Modified in Laskey v. Newtown Co., 50 Fed. 635, holding under acts of 1887 and 1888, where jurisdiction depends on diverse citizenship only, complaint must show that one of the parties resides in district where action is brought; to same effect, Central Trust Co. v. Virginia Iron Co., 55 Fed. 773.

Federal courts.—Where defendant is sued in United States Circuit Court, in district of which he is not a resident, a general appearance constitutes a waiver of the irregularity, p. 700.

ACTION—8.

No action at law will lie on the decretal order of a court of equity.

ADMIRALTY—5.

1. The courts of the United States have no jurisdiction, under the act of April 30, 1790, c. 33, of the crime of manslaughter, committed by the master upon one of the seamen on board a merchant vessel of the United States, lying in the river Tigris, in the empire of China, 35 miles above its mouth, off Wampoa, about 100 yards from the shore, in four and a half fathoms water, and below low water-mark.

United States v. Wiltberger, (76, 93) 37, 42

2. In the same act, the description of place contained in the 8th sec., within which the offenses therein enumerated must be committed, in order to give the courts of the Union jurisdiction over them, cannot be transferred to the 12th sec., so as to give those courts jurisdiction over a manslaughter committed in the river of a foreign country, and not on the high seas.

Id. (96) 43

3. History and extent of the criminal jurisdiction of the Admiralty.

Id. note 1, (106) 45

4. Information under the act of the 3d of March, 1807, c. 77, to prevent the importation of slaves into the United States. The alleged unlawful importation attempted to be excused upon the plea of distress. Excuse repelled, and condemnation pronounced.

The Josefa Segunda, (338, 351) 104, 107

5. Upon a piratical capture, the property of the original owners cannot be forfeited for the misconduct of the captors, in violating the municipal laws of the country where the vessel seized by them is carried.

Id. (1b.) 104, 107

6. But where the capture is made by a regularly commissioned captor, he acquires a title to the captured property, which can only be divested by recapture, or by the sentence of a competent tribunal of his own country; and the property is subject to forfeiture for a violation, by the captor, of the revenue or other municipal laws of the neutral country into which the prize is carried.

7. Speech of Mr. (now Chief Justice) Marshall, in Congress, in the case of Thomas Nash, alias Jonathan Robbins.

See Piracy.
See Prize.

ADMIRALTY—6.

1. A question of fact, under the 46th section of the collection law of the 2d of March, 1799, c. 128, exempting from duty the wearing apparel, and other personal baggage, of persons arriving in the United States.

The Robert Edwards, (187) 238

2. Where the res gesta, in a revenue cause, are incapable of explanation consistently with the innocence of the party, condemnation follows, although there be no positive testimony of the offense having been committed.

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

Id. (1b.) 238

3. Although a mere intention to evade the payment of duties be not, per se, a cause of forfeiture, yet when a question arises, whether an act has been committed which draws after it that consequence, such intention will justify the court in not putting on the conduct of the party, in respect to the act in question, an interpretation as favorable as under other circumstances it would be disposed to do.

Id. (191) 239

4. In all proceeding in rem, on an appeal, the property follows the cause into the Circuit Court, and is subject to the disposition of that court. But it does not follow the cause into the Supreme Court, on an appeal to that court.

The Collector, (194) 239

5. After an appeal from the District to the Circuit Court, the former court can make no order respecting the property, whether it has been sold, and the proceeds paid into court, or whether it remains specifically, or its proceeds remain, in the hands of the marshal.

Id. (1b.) 239

6. It is a great irregularity for the marshal to keep the property, or the proceeds thereof, in his own hands, or to distribute the same among the parties entitled, without a special order from the court; but such an irregularity may be cured by the assent and ratification of all the parties interested, if there be no mala fides.

Id. (194) 239

7. Under the 67th section of the collection act of the 2d of March, 1799, c. 128, where goods were entered by an agent of the owner on his behalf, and the entry included only a part of the goods which the packages contained, and the owner subsequently made a further, or post entry of the residue of the goods; and the packages being opened several days afterwards and examined by the collector in the presence of two merchants, and their contents found to agree with the two entries taken together, but to differ materially from the first entry; held, that the collector was not precluded from making a seizure of the goods after the second entry, for a variance between the contents of the packages and the first entry, and that such seizure must be followed by confiscation, unless it should appear that such difference proceeded from accident and mistake, and not from an intention to defraud the revenue.

The United States v. Six Packages of Goods, (520) 321

See Practice, 4.
See Prize.

ADMIRALTY—7.

1. An offense against a temporary statute cannot be punished after the expiration of the act, unless a particular provision be made by law for that purpose.

The Irresistible, (551) 520

2. The proviso in the repealing clause of the Neutrality Act of the 20th of April, 1818, did not authorize a forfeiture under the act of the 3d of March, 1817, (which was included in the repeal), after the time when that act would have expired by its own limitation.

The Irresistible,

ADMIRALTY—8.

1. The non-intercourse act of the 18th of April 1818, c. 65, prohibits the coming of British vessels to the ports of the United States, from a British port closed against the commerce of the United States, either directly, or through an open British port; but it does not prohibit the coming of such vessels from a British closed port, through a foreign port (not British), where the continuity of the voyage is fairly broken.

The Pitt,

(371, 377) 639, 640

2. A libel of information, under the ninth sec. of the slave trade act of March 2d, 1807, c. 77, alleging that the vessel sailed from the ports of New York and Perth Amboy, without the captain's having delivered the manifests required by law to the collector or surveyor of New York and Perth Amboy, is defective; the act requiring the manifest to be delivered to the collector or surveyor of a single port.

The Mary Ann,

3. Under the same section, the libel must charge the vessel to be of the burthen of forty tons or more. In general, it is sufficient to charge the offense in the words directing the forfeiture; but if the words are general, embracing a whole class of individual subjects, but must necessarily be so construed as to embrace only a subdivision of that class, the allegation must conform to the legislative sense and meaning.

(385) 642

4. Where the libel is so informal and defective, that the court cannot enter upon a decree upon it, and the evidence discloses a case of forfeiture, this court will not amend the libel itself, but will remand the cause to the court below, with directions to permit it to be amended.

(390) 483

5. In cases of seizures made on land under the revenue laws, the District Court proceeds as a court of common law, according to the course of the exchequer on informations in rem, and the trial of issues of facts is to be by jury; but in cases of seizures on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, it proceeds as an instance court of Admiralty, by libel, and the trial is to be by the court.

The Sarah,

6. A libel charging the seizure to have been made on water, when in fact it was made on land, will not support a verdict, and judgment or sentence thereon; but must be amended or dismissed. The two jurisdictions, and the proceedings under them, are to be kept entirely distinct.

Id.

(394) 644

7. Note on the jurisdiction of the Instance Court in revenue causes.

Id. Note 1,

(396) 645

8. If a British ship come from a foreign port (not British) to a port of the United States, the continuity of the voyage is not broken, and the vessel is not liable to forfeiture, under the act of April 18th, 1818, c. 65, by touching at an intermediate British closed port, from necessity, and in order to procure provisions, without trading there.

The Frances and Eliza,

(398) 645

9. A case of forfeiture, under the twenty-seventh section of the registry of vessels act, of December 31, 1792, c. 146, for the fraudulent use of a register, by a vessel not actually entitled to the benefit of it.

The Luminary,

(407) 647

10. Where the onus probandi is thrown on the claimant, in an instance or revenue cause, by a prima facie case, made out on the part of the prosecutor, and the claimant fails to explain the difficulties of the case by the production of papers and other evidence which must be in his possession, or under his control, condemnation follows from the defects of testimony on the part of the claimant.

AGENT—5.

1. The acts of agents do not derive their validity from professing on the face of them to have been done in the exercise of their agency.

Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia,

(326, 337) 100, 103

2 The liability of the principal for the acts of his agent depends upon the facts, 1st, That the act was done in the exercise, and, 2d. Within the limits of the power delegated.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL—6.

H. and others, merchants in Baltimore, consigned a vessel and cargo to W. and others, merchants in Amsterdam, with instructions to them respecting her ulterior destination, which showed, that on the failure of getting a freight to Batavia, or of selling the vessel at a price limited, she was to proceed to St. Petersburg, and there take in a return cargo of Russia goods for the United States, but with instructions to the master committing to him the management of the ulterior voyage. No freight to Batavia could be obtained, and the vessel could not be sold for the price limited at Amsterdam; and W. and others, purchased in Amsterdam, with the concurrence of the master, a return cargo of Russian goods, partly with the money of H. and others, and partly with money advanced by themselves. On the return of the vessel to Baltimore, H. and others objected to the purchase of this cargo in Amsterdam, as being contrary to express orders, and gave notice to W. and others, of their determination to hold them responsible for all losses sustained in consequence of this breach of instructions; but received the goods and sold them. W. and others brought an assumpsit against H. and others, to recover from them the moneys advanced. The declaration contained the three usual money counts. Held, 1st. That the plaintiffs had a demand in law against the defendants, which could be maintained in this form of action. 2d. That whether the plaintiffs could, or could not, be made responsible in any form of action which might be devised for the possible loss resulting from the breaking up of the intended voyage to St. Petersburg, the defendants were not entitled to a deduction from the plaintiffs' demand, for the amount of such loss.

ALIEN—7.

1. British subjects born before the revolution, are equally incapable with those born after, of inheriting, or transmitting the inheritance of lands in this country.

Blight's lessee v. Rochester, (535, 544) 516, 518

2. The treaties of 1783, and 1794, only provide for titles existing at the time those treaties were made, and not to titles subsequently acquired.

ATTORNEY—8.

1. A power of attorney, though irrevocable on its face, or as being given as a security, is revoked by the death of the party.

Hunt v. Rousmanier, (174, 201) 589, 596

2. A power of attorney, coupled with an interest in the thing, survives the party giving it, and may be executed after his death.

Id. (203) 597

3. How far a court of equity will compel the specific execution of a contract, intended to be secured by an irrevocable power of attorney, which was revoked by operation of law on the death of the party.

AWARD—5.

1. Where claims against a party, both in his own right, and in a representative character, are submitted to the award of arbitrators, it is a valid objection to the award, that it does not precisely distinguish between moneys which are to be paid by him in his representative character, and those for which he is personally bound.

Lyle v. Rodgers, (394, 407) 117, 120

2. An award may be void in part, and good for the residue. But if the part which is void be so connected with the rest as to affect the justice of the case between the parties, the whole is void.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE—5.

1. Bills of exchange and negotiable promissory notes are distinguished from all other parol contracts by the circumstance that they are prima facie evidence of valuable consideration, both between the original parties and against third persons.

Mandeville v. Welch, (277, 283) 87, 89

2. A bill of exchange is an assignment to the payee, of the debt due from the drawee to the drawer.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES—6.

1. Where the second day of grace falls on Saturday, it is the last day of grace; and notice of non-payment given to the drawer of a bill on that day, after a demand upon the acceptor on the same day, is sufficient to charge the drawer.

Bussard v. Levering, (102) 215

2. Notice to the drawer, by putting the same into the post-office, where the persons live in different places, is good.

Id. (1b.) 215

3. After demand of the maker of a note, on the third day of grace, notice to the indorser on the same day, is sufficient by the general law merchant.

Lindenberger v. Beall, (104) 216

4. Evidence of a letter, containing notice, having been put into the post-office, directed to the indorser, at his place of residence, is sufficient proof of the notice to be left to the jury, and it is unnecessary to give notice to the defendant to produce the letter before such evidence can be admitted.

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

5. No protest of a promissory note, or inland bill of exchange, is necessary.

Young v. Bryan, (146) 228

6. A protest of an inland bill or promissory note is not necessary, nor is it evidence of the facts stated in it.

The Union Bank v. Hyde, (572) 333

7. The following undertaking of the endorser of a promissory note, "I do request that hereafter any notes that may fall due in the Union Bank, in which I am, or may be indorser, shall not be protested, as I will consider myself bound in the same manner as if the said notes had been or should be legally protested," held to be ambiguous as to whether it amounted to a waiver of demand and notice; and parol proof admitted to show that it was the understanding of the parties, that the demand and notice required by law to charge the indorser, should be dispensed with.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES—7.

1. A bill, or note, is prima facie evidence, under a count for money had and received, against the drawer or indorser.

Page's Administrator v. The Bank of Alexandria, (35) 390

2. But the presumption, that the contents of the bill or note have been received by the party sued, and for the use of the plaintiff, may be rebutted by circumstances; and a recovery cannot be had, in such a case, where it is proved that the money was actually received by another party.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE AND PROMISSORY NOTES—8.

1. Banks, and other commercial corporations, may bind themselves by the acts of their authorized officers and agents, without the corporate seal.

Fleckner v. U. S. Bank, (338, 357) 631, 635

2. The negotiability of a promissory note, payable to order, is not restrained by the circumstance of its being given for the purchase of real property in Louisiana, and the notary, before whom the contract of sale is executed, writing upon it the words "ne varietur," according to the laws and usages of that state, and other countries governed by the civil law.

Id. (363) 637

3. The statutes of usury of England, and of the states of the Union, expressly provide that usurious contracts shall be utterly void; but, without such a provision, they are not void as against parties who are strangers to the usury.

Id. (355) 635

4. The statute incorporating the Bank of the United States does not avoid securities on which usurious interest may have been taken, and the usury cannot be set up as a defense to a note on which it is taken. It is merely a violation of the charter, for which a remedy may be applied by the government.

CHANCERY—5.

1. A deposit of title deeds as security for a debt, creates a lien which is considered an equitable mortgage.

Maudeville v. Welch, (277, 284) 87, 90

2. So also the deposit of a note, not negotiable, as security for a debt, will entitle the creditor, after notice to the maker, to enforce in equity his lien against the depositor and his assignees in bankruptcy.

Id. (284) 90

3. But this doctrine proceeds upon the supposition that the deposit is clearly established to have been made as security for the debt, and not upon the ground that the mere fact of a deposit unexplained affords such proof.

Id. (Ib.) 90

4. In equity, a final decree cannot be pronounced until all the parties in interest are brought before the court.

Marshall v. Beverley, (313, 315) 97

5. Where a bill was filed for a perpetual injunction, on judgments obtained on certain bills of exchange drawn by the plaintiff, and negotiated to the defendant, and which had subsequently passed from the latter into the hands of third persons, by whom the judgments were obtained; held, that the injunction could not be decreed until their answers had come in, although the bill stated, and the defendant admitted, that he had paid the judgments, and was then the only person interested in them, because such statement and admission might be made by collusion.

Id. (Ib.) 97

6. In appeals to this court, from the circuit courts, in chancery cases, the parol testimony which is heard at the trial in the court below ought to appear in the record.

Comm v. Penn, (424) 125

7. A final decree in equity, or an interlocutory decree, which in a great measure decides the merits of the cause, cannot be pronounced, until all the parties to the bill, and all the parties in interest, are before the court.

Id. (Ib.) 125

8. Explanation of the former decree of this court in the case of Campbell v. Pratt et al. (9 Cranch, 500, S. C.)

(429) 126

CHANCERY—6.

1. There is no difference in respect to the conclusiveness of a judgment at law and of a decree in chancery. Both are conclusive as to the facts directly in controversy.

Hopkins v. Lee, (109, 113) 218, 219

2. A decree cannot be pronounced, on the testimony of a single witness, unaccompanied by corroborating circumstances, against a positive denial, by the defendant, of any matter directly charged by the bill, in the defendant's answer, or answer in support of his plea.

Hughes v. Blake, (453) 303

3. A replication to a plea is an admission of the sufficiency of the plea, as much as if it had been set down for argument, and allowed; and all that the defendant has to do, is to prove it in point of fact, and a dismission of the bill on the hearing is then a matter of course.

Id. (Ib.) 303

4. Under what circumstances a plea of a former judgment at law, for the same cause of action, is a good bar in equity.

Id. (Ib.) 303

5. To establish the existence of a trust, the onus probandi lies on the party who alleges it.

Prevost v. Gratz, (481) 311

6. In general, length of time is no bar to a trust clearly established to have once existed; and where fraud is imputed and proved, length of time ought not to exclude relief.

Id. (497) 315

7. But as length of time necessarily obscures all human evidence, and deprives parties of the means of ascertaining the nature of the original transactions, it operates, by way of presumption, in favor of innocence, and against imputation of fraud.

Prevost v. Gratz, (497) 315

8. The lapse of forty years, and the death of all the original parties, deemed sufficient to presume the discharge and extinguishment of a trust, proved once to have existed by strong circumstances; by analogy to the rule of law, which after a lapse of time presumes the payment of a debt, surrender of a deed, and extinguishment of a trust, where circumstances require it.

Id. (Ib.) 315

9. The general rule is, that time is not of the essence of a contract of sale; and a failure on the part of the purchaser, or vendor, to perform his contract, on the stipulated day, does not, of itself, deprive him of his right to a specific performance, when he is able to comply with his part of the engagement.

Brashier v. Gratz, (528) 322

10. But circumstances may be so changed that the object of the party can no longer be accomplished, and he cannot be placed in the same situation as if the contract had been performed in due time. In such a case, a court of equity will leave the parties to their remedy at law.

Id. (Ib.) 322

11. Part performance will, under some circumstances, induce the court to relieve.

Id. (Ib.) 322

12. But where a considerable length of time has elapsed, where the party demanding a specific performance has failed to perform his part of the contract, and the demand is made after a great change in the title and the value of the land, and there is a want of reciprocity in the obligations of the respective parties, a court of equity will not interfere.

Id. (Ib.) 322

13. Who are necessary parties in equity.

Kerr v. Watts, (550, 558) 328, 330

14. Application of the law of set-off and lien in equity, under peculiar circumstances.

Leeds v. The Marine Insurance Company, (565) 332

CHANCERY—7.

1. The vendor of real property, who has not taken a separate security for the purchase money, has a lien for it, on the land, as against the vendee and his heirs.

Bailey v. Greenleaf, (46, 50) 393, 395

2. This lien is defeated by an alienation to a bona fide purchaser without notice.

Id. (50) 395

3. Nor can it be asserted against creditors holding under a bona fide conveyance from the vendee.

Id. (Ib.) 395

4. Quære, Whether the lien can be asserted against the assignees of a bankrupt, or other creditors coming in under the purchaser by act of law.

Id. (Ib.) 395

6. It is a rule, both of law and equity, that a party must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of his adversary's.

Watts v. Lindsey's heirs, (158, 161) 423, 424

7. The decree must conform to the allegations in the pleadings, as well as the proofs in the cause.

Crockett v. Lee, (522, 525) 513, 514

See Local Law, 3, 28, 29, 30.

See Practice, 1.

CHANCERY—8.

1. A letter of attorney may, in general, be revoked by the party making it, and is revoked by his death.

Hunt v. Roumanier, (174, 201) 589, 596

2. Where it forms a part of a contract, and is a security for the performance of any act, it is usually made irrevocable in terms, or, if not so made, is deemed irrevocable in law.

Id. (201) 596

3. But a power of attorney, though irrevocable during the life of the party, becomes (at law) extinct by his death.

Id. (202) 596

4. But if the power be coupled with an interest, it survives the person giving it, and may be executed after his death.

Id. (Ib.) 596

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

5. To constitute a power coupled with an interest, there must be an interest in the thing itself, and not merely in the execution of the power.

Hunt v. Rousmanier, (204) 597

6. How far a court of equity will compel the specific execution of a contract, intended to be secured by an irrevocable power of attorney, which was revoked by operation of law on the death of the party.

Id. (207) 598

7. The general rule, both at law and in equity, is, that parol testimony is not admissible to vary a written instrument.

Id. (211) 599

8. But in cases of fraud and mistake, courts of equity will relieve.

Id. (1b.) 599

9. It seems that a court of equity will relieve in a case of mistake of law merely.

Id. (1b.) 599

10. A post-nuptial voluntary settlement, made by a man, who is not indebted at the time, upon his wife, is valid against subsequent creditors.

Sexton v. Wheaton, (229) 603

11. The statute 13 Eliz. c. 5, avoids all conveyances not made on a consideration deemed valuable in law as against previous creditors.

Id. (242) 607

12. But it does not apply to subsequent creditors, if the conveyance is not made with a fraudulent intent.

Id. (238) 606

13. What circumstances will constitute evidence of such a fraudulent intent.

Id. (250) 609

14. An insolvent debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another, in payment, by an assignment bona fide made, and no subsequent attachment, or subsequently acquired lien, will avoid the assignment.

Spring v. S. C. Ins. Co., (268, 282) 614, 617

15. Such an assignment may include choses in action, as a policy of insurance, and will entitle the assignee to receive from the underwriters the amount insured in case of a loss. It is not necessary that the assignment should be accompanied by an actual delivery of the policy.

Id. (268) 614

16. Upon a bill of interpleader, filed by underwriters against the different creditors of an insolvent debtor, claiming the fund proceeding from an insurance made for account of the debtor, some on the ground of special liens, and others under the assignment, the rights of the respective parties will be determined. But, on such a bill, those of the co-defendants who fail in establishing any right to the fund, are not entitled to an account from the defendant, whose claims are allowed, of the amount and origin of those claims.

Id. (292) 619

17. On a bill of interpleader, the plaintiffs are, in general, entitled to their costs out of the fund. Where the money is not brought into court, they must pay interest upon it.

Id. (293) 620

18. Under the act of assembly of Virginia, of October, 1783, for the better locating and surveying the lands given to the officers and soldiers on continental and state establishments, the state of Virginia has no right to call upon the person who was appointed one of the principal surveyors, to account for the fees received by him, of one dollar for every hundred acres, on delivering the warrants, towards raising a fund for the purpose of supporting all contingent expenses; the bill filed by the Attorney-General of the state, to compel an account, not sufficiently averring the want of any proper private parties in esse to claim it.

Nicholas v. Anderson, (365, 369) 637, 638

19. Quere, Whether, in such a case, the assignees of the warrants, or a part of them, suing in behalf of the whole, could maintain a suit in equity for an account?

Id. (370) 638

20. A trustee cannot purchase or acquire by exchange, the trust property.

Wormley v. Wormley, (421, 438) 651, 655

21. Where the trustee, in a marriage settlement, has a power to sell, and re-invest the trust property, whenever, in his opinion, the purchase money may be laid out advantageously for the cestuis que trust, that opinion must be fairly and honestly exercised; and the sale will be void where he appears to have been influenced by private and selfish interests, and the sale is for an inadequate price.

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

22. Quere, How far a bonæ fidei purchaser, without notice of the breach of trust, in such a case, is bound to see to the application of the purchase money?

Wormley v. Wormley, (442) 656

23. Where the purchase money is to be re-invested upon trusts that require time and discretion, or the acts of sale and re-investment are contemplated to be at a distance from each other, the purchaser is not bound to look to the application of the purchase money.

Id. (443) 657

24. But wherever the purchaser is affected with notice of the facts, which, in law, constitute the breach of trust, the sale is void as to him; and a mere general denial of all knowledge of fraud will not avail him, if the transaction is such as a court of equity cannot sanction.

Id. (447) 658

25. A bonæ fidei purchaser, without notice, to be entitled to protection, must be so, not only at the time of the contract or conveyance, but until the purchase money is actually paid.

Id. (449) 658

26. This court will not suffer its jurisdiction, in an equity cause, to be ousted, by the circumstance of the joinder or non-joinder of merely formal parties, who are not entitled to sue, or liable to be sued, in the United States courts.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—5.

1. The act of the state of Pennsylvania, of the 28th of March, 1814 (providing, sec. 21, that the officers and privates of the militia of that state, neglecting or refusing to serve, when called into actual service, in pursuance of any order or requisition of the President of the United States, shall be liable to the penalties defined in the act of Congress of the 28th of February, 1795, c. 277, or to any penalty which may have been prescribed since the date of that act, or which may hereafter be prescribed by any law of the United States, and also providing for the trial of such delinquents by a state court martial, and that a list of the delinquents fined by such court should be furnished to the Marshal of the United States, &c., and also to the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, in order that the further proceedings directed to be had thereon by the laws of the United States might be completed), is not repugnant to the constitution and laws of the United States.

Houston v. Moore, (1, 12) 19, 21

2. The powers granted to Congress are not exclusive of similar powers existing in the states, unless where the constitution has expressly in terms given an exclusive power to Congress, or the exercise of a like power is prohibited to the states, or there is a direct repugnancy or incompatibility in the exercise of it by the states.

Id. (49) 30

3. The example of the first class is to be found in the exclusive legislation delegated to Congress over places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, &c.; of the second class, the prohibition of a state to coin money or emit bills of credit; of the third class, the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and the delegation of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.

Id. (1b.) 30

4. In all other classes of cases, the states retain concurrent authority with Congress.

Id. (1b.) 30

5. But in cases of concurrent authority, where the laws of the states and of the Union are in direct and manifest collision on the same subject, those of the Union being the supreme law of the land, are of paramount authority, and the state laws, so far, and so far only, as such incompatibility exists, must necessarily yield.

Houston v. Moore, (49) 30

6. The act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, s. 5, referring to the law of nations for a definition of the crime of piracy, is a constitutional exercise of the power of Congress to define and punish that crime.

United States v. Smith, (153, 157) 57, 58

7. Congress has authority to impose a direct tax on the District of Columbia, in proportion to the census directed to be taken by the constitution.

Loughborough v. Blake, (317) 98

8. The power of Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., extends to the District of Columbia, and to the territories of the United States, as well as to the states.

Id. (318) 98

9. But Congress are not bound to extend a direct tax to the district and territories.

Id. (322) 99

10. The constitutional provision, that direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states according to their respective numbers, to be ascertained by a census, was not intended to restrict the power of imposing direct taxes to states only.

Loughborough v. Blake, (319) 98

11. The power of Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all cases whatsoever within the District of Columbia, includes the power of taxing it.

Id. (324) 100

12. The present constitution of the United States did not commence its operation until the first Wednesday in March, 1789, and the provision in the constitution, that "no state shall make any law impairing the obligation of contracts," does not extend to a state law enacted before that day, and operating upon rights of property vested before that time.

Owings v. Speed, (420) 124

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—6.

1. The record of a judgment in one state is conclusive evidence in another, although it appears that the suit, in which it was rendered, was commenced by an attachment of property, the defendant having afterwards appeared and taken defense.

Mayhew v. Thatcher, (129) 223

2. An act of a state legislature which discharges a debtor from all liability for debts contracted previous to his discharge, on his surrendering his property for the benefit of his creditors, is a law impairing the obligation of contracts within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, so far as it attempts to discharge the contract: and it makes no difference in such a case, that the suit was brought in a state court of the state, of which both the parties were citizens, where the contract was made, and the discharge obtained, and where they continued to reside until the suit was brought.

Farmers and Mechanics' Bank v. Smith, (131) 224

3. To an action of trespass against the sergeant at arms of the House of Representatives of the United States, for an assault and battery and false imprisonment, it is a legal justification and bar, to plead that a Congress was held and sitting, during the period of the trespasses complained of, and that the House of Representatives had resolved that the plaintiff had been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the House, and of a high contempt of the dignity and authority of the same; and had ordered that the Speaker should issue his warrant to the sergeant at arms, commanding him to take the plaintiff into custody, wherever to be found, and to have him before the said House, to answer to the said charge; and that the Speaker did accordingly issue such a warrant, reciting the said resolution and order, and commanding the sergeant at arms to take the plaintiff into custody, &c., and delivered the said warrant to the defendant: By virtue of which warrant the defendant arrested the plaintiff, and conveyed him to the bar of the House, where he was heard in his defense, touching the matter of the said charge, and the examination being adjourned from day to day, and the House having ordered the plaintiff to be detained in custody, he was accordingly detained by the defendant until he was finally adjudged to be guilty, and convicted of the charge aforesaid, and ordered to be forthwith brought to the bar, and reprimanded by the Speaker, and then discharged from custody; and after being thus reprimanded, was actually discharged from the arrest and custody aforesaid.

Anderson v. Dunn, (204) 242

4. This court has, constitutionally, appellate jurisdiction under the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, s. 25, from the final judgment or decree of the highest court of law or equity of a state, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty, or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such, their validity; or of the constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or exemption, specially set up or claimed by either party, under such clause of the constitution, treaty, statute, or commission.

Cohens v. Virginia, (264, 375) 257, 284

5. It is no objection to the exercise of this appellate jurisdiction, that one of the parties is a state, and the other a citizen of that state.

Id. (Ib.) 257, 284

6. The act of Congress of the 4th of May, 1812, entitled, "An act further to amend the charter of the city of Washington," which provides (s. 6) that the corporation of the city shall be empowered for certain purposes, and under certain restrictions, to authorize the drawing of lotteries, does not extend to authorize the corporation to force the sale of the tickets in such lottery, in states where such sale may be prohibited by the state laws.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—7.

1. This court has authority to issue a habeas corpus, where a person is imprisoned under the warrant or order of any other court of the United States.

Ex-parte Kearney, (38, 41) 391, 392

2. But this court has no appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases, confided to it by the laws of the United States, and cannot revise the judgments of the circuit courts, by writ of error, in any case where a party has been convicted of a public offense.

Id. (41) 392

3. Hence the court will not grant a habeas corpus, where a party has been committed for a contempt adjudged by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Id. (Ib.) 392

4. In such a case, this court will not inquire into the sufficiency of the cause of commitment.

Id. (Ib.) 392

5. The case of Crosby, Lord Mayor of London, 3 Wils. 188, commented on, and its authority confirmed.

Id. (Ib.) 392

6. A commitment for a contempt by a court of competent jurisdiction, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, is conclusive, and cannot be inquired into in any other tribunal.

Id. (Ib.) 392

7. Where a party claiming title to lands under an act of Congress, brought a bill for a conveyance, and stated several equitable circumstances in aid of his title, and the state court where the suit was brought having dismissed the bill, and the cause being brought to this court by appeal, under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, upon the ground of an alleged misconstruction of the act of Congress under which the title was claimed, by the state court: Held, that this court could not take into consideration any distinct equity arising out of the contracts or transactions of the parties, and creating a new and independent title, but was confined to an examination of the plaintiff's title as depending upon the construction of the act of Congress.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—8.

1. The act of the state of Kentucky, of the 27th of February, 1797, concerning occupying claimants of land, whilst it was in force, was repugnant to the constitution of the United States, but it was repealed by a subsequent act of the 31st of January, 1812, to amend the said act; and the last-mentioned act is also repugnant to the constitution of the United States, as being in violation of the compact between the states of Virginia and Kentucky, contained in the act of the legislature of Virginia, of the 18th of December, 1789, and incorporated into the constitution of Kentucky.

Green v. Biddle, (1, 69) 547, 564

2. By the common law, the statute law of Virginia, the principles of equity, and the civil law, the claimant of lands who succeeds in his suit, is entitled to an account of mesne profits, received by the occupant from some period prior to the judgment of eviction, or decree.

Id. (74, 81) 565, 567

3. At common law, whoever takes and holds possession of land, to which another has a better title, whether he be a bonæ fidei or a malæ fidei possessor, is liable to the true owner for all the rents and profits which he has received; but the disseisor, if he be a bonæ fidei occupant, may recoup the value of the meliorations made by him against the claim of damages.

Id. (75, 80) 565, 567

4. Equity allows an account of rents and profits in all cases, from the time of the title accrued (provided it does not exceed six years), unless under special circumstances, as where the defendant had no notice of the plaintiff's title, nor had the deeds in which the plaintiff's title appeared in his custody, or where there has been laches in the plaintiff in not asserting his title, or where his title appeared by deeds in a stranger's custody; in all which, and other similar cases, the account is confined to the time of filing the bill.

Id. (78) 566

5. By the civil law, the exemption of the occupant from an account for rents and profits is strictly confined to the case of a bonæ fidei possessor, who not only supposes himself to be the true owner of the land, but who is ignorant that his title is contested by some other person claiming a better right. And such a possessor is entitled only to the fruits or profits which were produced by his own industry, and even to those, unless they were consumed.

Id. (79) 566

6. Distinctions between these rules of the civil and common law, and of the Court of Chancery, and the provisions of the acts of Kentucky, concerning occupying claimants of land.

Id. (81, 82) 567

7. The invalidity of a state law, as impairing the obligation of contracts, does not depend upon the extent of the change which the law effects in the contract.

Id. (84) 568

8. Any deviation from its terms, by postponing or accelerating the period of its performance, imposing conditions not expressed in the contract, or dispensing with the performance of those which are expressed, however minute or apparently immaterial in their effect upon the contract, impairs its obligation.

Id. (Ib.) 568

9. The compact of 1789, between Virginia and Kentucky, was valid under that provision of the constitution, which declares that "no state shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power"—no particular mode, in which that consent must be given, having been prescribed by the constitution; and Congress having consented to the admission of Kentucky into the Union, as a sovereign state, upon the conditions mentioned in the compact.

Id. (85) 568

10. The compact is not invalid upon the ground of its surrendering rights of sovereignty, which are unalienable.

Id. (88) 569

11. This court has authority to declare a state law unconstitutional, upon the ground of its impairing the obligation of a compact between different states of the Union.

Green v. Biddle, (92) 570

12. The prohibition of the constitution embraces all contracts, executed or executory, between private individuals, or a state and individuals, or corporations, or between the states themselves.

Id. (Ib.) 570

13. The appellate jurisdiction of this court, in cases brought from the state courts, arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the Union, is not limited by the value of the matter in dispute.

Buell v. Van Ness, (312, 321) 624, 626

14. Its jurisdiction in such cases extends to a case where both parties claim a right or title under the same act of Congress, and the decision is against the right or title claimed by either party.

Id. (323) 627

15. A corporation for religious and charitable purposes, which is endowed solely by private benefactions, is a private eleemosynary corporation, although it is created by a charter from the government.

Society, &c., v. New Haven, (464, 480) 662, 666

16. The capacity of private individuals (British subjects), or of corporations created by the crown, in this country, or in Great Britain, to hold lands or other property in this country, was not affected by the revolution.

Id. (481) 666

17. The proper courts in this country will interfere to prevent an abuse of the trusts confided to British corporations holding lands here to charitable uses, and will aid in enforcing the due execution of the trusts; but neither those courts, nor the local legislature where the lands lie, can adjudge a forfeiture of the franchises of the foreign corporation, or of its property.

Id. (483) 667

18. The property of British corporations, in this country, is protected by the sixth article of the treaty of peace of 1783, in the same manner as those of natural persons; and their title, thus protected, is confirmed by the ninth article of the treaty of 1794, so that it could not be forfeited by any intermediate legislative act, or other proceeding, for the defect of alienage.

Id. (489, 491) 668, 669

19. The termination of a treaty, by war, does not divest rights of property already vested under it.

Id. (492) 669

20. Nor do treaties, in general, become extinguished, ipso facto, by war between the two governments. Those stipulating for a permanent arrangement of territorial, and other national rights, are, at most, suspended during the war, and revive at the peace, unless they are waived by the parties, or new and repugnant stipulations are made.

Id. (493) 669

21. The act of the legislature of Vermont, of the 30th of October, 1794, granting the lands in that state, belonging to "The Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts," to the respective towns in which the lands lie, is void, and conveys no title under it.

Id. (464) 662

22. An insolvent debtor who has received a certificate of discharge from arrest and imprisonment under a state insolvent law, is not entitled to be discharged from execution at the suit of the United States.

25. A title to lands, under grants to private individuals, made by Indian tribes or nations northwest of the river Ohio, in 1773 and 1775, cannot be recognized in the courts of the United States.

Johnson v. McIntosh, (543) 681

26. Discovery, the original foundation of titles to land on the American continent, as between the different European nations, by whom conquests and settlements were made here.

Id. (573) 688

27. The European governments asserted the exclusive right of granting the soil to individuals, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy.

Id. (574) 688

28. Practice of Spain, France, Holland, and England, as to newly discovered countries.

Id. (Ib.) 688

29. Recognition of the same principle in the wars, negotiations, and treaties between the different European powers.

Johnson v. McIntosh, (581) 690

30. Adoption of the same principle by the United States.

Id. (584) 691

31. The exclusive right of the British government to the lands occupied by the Indians has passed to that of the United States.

Childress v. Emory, (642) 705

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—6.

1. Where, in a contract with the Secretary of War for supplying the troops of the United States with provisions, specific prices are stipulated for rations issued at certain places mentioned in the contract; and it is further provided, that "should any rations be required at any places not specified in this contract, the price of the same shall be hereafter agreed on between the public and the contractor;" if the parties cannot agree upon the price for the rations thus required, a reasonable compensation is to be allowed, and is to be proved by competent evidence, and settled by a jury; and the contractor, upon the trial, is at liberty to show, that the sum allowed by the Secretary at War is not a reasonable compensation.

United States v. Wilkins, (135) 225

2. Under the 3d and 4th sections of the act of the 3d of March, 1797, c. 74, the defendant is entitled, at the trial, to the full benefit of any credit in his favor, whether arising out of the particular transaction for which he was sued, or out of distinct and independent transactions, which would constitute a legal or equitable set-off, in whole or in part, of the debt sued for by the United States.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—8.

1. An American private armed vessel, duly commissioned, making collusive captures of enemy's property during the late war with Great Britain, and under color of such captures introducing goods and merchandise into the United States, contrary to the provisions of the act of March 1, 1809, c. 195, revived and continued in force by the act of March 2, 1811, c. 306, thereby broke the condition of the bond given pursuant to the third section of the statute of June 26th, 1812, c. 430, requiring "that the owners, officers, and crew, who shall be employed on board such commissioned vessel, shall and will observe the treaties and laws of the United States."

Greeley v. United States, (259) 612

2. Where such breach appears upon demurrer, the defendants cannot, by law, claim a hearing under the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, c. 20, s. 26.

Id. (Ib.) 612

3. Under the ninety-first section of the duty act of 1799, c. 128, the share of a forfeiture, to which the collector, &c., of the district, is entitled, is to be paid to the person who was the collector, &c., in office at the time the seizure was made, and not to his successor in office at the time of condemnation and the receipt of the money.

Buell v. Van Ness, (312, 320) 624, 626

4. The act of the 10th of April, 1816, c. 44, incorporating the Bank of the United States, does not, by the ninth rule of the fundamental articles, prohibit the bank from discounting promissory notes, or receiving a transfer of notes in payment of a debt due the bank.

Fleckner v. Bank United States,

(338, 349) 631, 633

5. The Bank of the United States, and every other bank, not restrained by its charter, and also private bankers, on discounting notes and bills, have a right to deduct the legal interest from the amount of the note or bill, at the time it is discounted.

Id. (350) 634

6. The Bank of the United States is not restrained, by the ninth rule of the fundamental articles of its charter, from thus deducting interest, at the rate of six per cent., on notes or bills discounted by it.

Id. (351) 634

7. Under the eighth section of the act of 1812, to amend the act for the incorporation of the city of Washington, a sale of unimproved squares or lots in the city, for the payment of taxes, is illegal, unless such squares and lots have been assessed to the true and lawful proprietors thereof.

Corporation of Washington v. Pratt,

(681) 714

8. The lien upon each lot, for the taxes, is several and distinct, and the purchaser of each holds his lot unencumbered with the taxes due on the other lots held by his vendor.

Id. (Ib.) 714

9. The advertisement must contain a particular statement of the amount of taxes due on each lot separately.

Id. (Ib.) 714

10. If the sale of one or more lots produce the amount of taxes actually due on the whole by the same proprietor, the corporation cannot proceed to sell further.

COVENANT—7.

1. In general, a sum of money in gross, to be paid for the non-performance of an agreement, is considered as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages.

Taylor v. Sandiford, (13, 17) 384, 385

2. A fortiori, when it is expressly reserved as a penalty.

Id. (17) 385

3. Thus, where in a building contract, the following covenant was contained, "The said houses to be completely finished on or before the 24th of December next, under a penalty of $1,000 in case of failure," it was held, that this was not intended as liquidated damages for the breach of that single covenant only, but applied to all the covenants made by the same party in that agreement; that it was in the nature of a penalty, and could not be set-off in an action brought by the party to recover the price of the work.

Id. (Ib.) 385

4. An agreement to perform certain work within a limited time, under a certain penalty, is not to be construed as liquidating the damages which the party is to pay for the breach of his covenant.

1. J. B. devises all his real estate to the testator's son, J. B., Jun., and his heirs lawfully begotten; and, in case of his death without such issue, he orders A. Y., his executors and administrators, to sell the real estate within two years after the son's death; and he bequeaths the proceeds thereof to his brothers and sisters, by name, and their heirs forever, or such of them as shall be living at the death of the son, to be divided between them in equal proportions, share and share alike. All the brothers and sisters die, leaving issue. Then A. Y. dies, and afterwards J. B., Jun., the son, dies without issue. "Heirs" is a word of limitation; and none of the testator's brothers and sisters being alive at the death of J. B., Jun., the devise to them failed to take effect.

2. Quere, Whether a sale by the executors, &c., under such circumstances, is to be considered as valid in a court of law.

Id. (535) 679

3. However this may be, a sale thus made, after the lapse of two years from the death of J. B., Jun., is without authority, and conveys no title.

Id. (Ib.) 679

4. Quere, Under what circumstances a court of equity might relieve, in case the trustee should refuse to exercise the power within the prescribed period, or should exercise the same after that period.

See Admiralty, 1, 2, 3, 7.

EJECTMENT—7.

1. Possession of land by a party, claiming it as his own in fee, is prima facie evidence of his ownership and seizin of the inheritance.

Ricard v. Williams, (59, 105) 398, 409

2. But possession alone, unexplained by collateral circumstances, which show the quality and extent of the interest claimed, evidences no more than the mere fact of present occupation by right.

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

3. But if the party be in under title, and by mistake of law supposes himself possessed of a less estate than really belongs to him, the law will remit him to his full right and title.

Ricard v. Williams, (106) 409

4. It is a general rule that a disseisor cannot qualify his own wrong, but must be considered as disseisor in fee.

Id. (107) 410

5. But this rule is introduced only for the benefit of the disseisee, for the sake of electing his remedy.

Id. (Ib.) 410

6. And it must also appear that the party found in possession entered without right; for if his entry were congeable, or his possession lawful, his entry and possession will be considered as limited by his right.

EMBARGO—6.

1. Under the embargo act of the 25th April, 1808, c. 170 (LXVI.), if a vessel, not actually arriving at her port of original destination, excites an honest suspicion in the mind of the collector that her demand of a permit to land the cargo was merely colorable, this is not a termination of the voyage so as to preclude the right of detention.

2. Where a check was drawn by a person who was the cashier of an incorporated bank, and it appeared doubtful upon the face of the instrument whether it was an official or private act, parol evidence was admitted to show that it was a private act.

Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia, (326, 336) 100, 103

3. The acts of agents do not derive their validity from professing on the face of them to have been done in the exercise of their agency; but the liability of the principal depends upon the facts, 1st. That the act was done in the exercise, and 2d. 2. But the rule does not apply to points which come only collaterally under consideration, or are only incidentally considered, or can only be argumentatively inferred from the decree.

Id. (Ib.) 218, 219

3. A replication to a plea in Chancery is an admission of its sufficiency in point of equity, and all that the defendant has to do, is to prove it in point of fact.

3. A fortiori, they cannot arise where the claim is of such a nature as is at variance with the supposition of a grant.

Id. (110) 411

4. In general, the presumption of a grant is limited to periods analogous to those of the statute of limitations, in cases where the statute does not apply.

Id. (1b.) 411

5. Where the statute applies, the presumption is not generally resorted to; but if the circumstances of the case are very cogent, and require it, a grant may be presumed within a period short of the statute.

Id. (1b.) 411

6. Under the laws of Massachusetts and Connecticut, the power of an administrator to sell the real estate of his intestate, under an order of the Court of Probates, must be exercised within a reasonable time after the death of the intestate.

Id. (115) 412

7. The case of such a power to sell is not within the purview of the statute of limitations of Connecticut, which limits all rights of entry and action to fifteen years after the title accrues; but the reasonable time, within which the power must be exercised, is to be fixed by analogy to that statute.

Id. (117) 412

8. One heir, notwithstanding his entry as heir, may afterwards, by disseisin of his co-heirs, acquire an exclusive possession, upon which the statute will run both against his co-heirs and against creditors.

Id. (120) 413

9. An heir may claim an estate by title distinct or paramount to that of his ancestor; and if his possession is exclusive under such claim, against all other persons, until the statute period has run, he is entitled to the protection of the bar.

Id. (121) 413

10. A person having an interest only in the question, and not in the event of the suit, is a competent witness.

Evans v. Eaton, (356, 421) 472, 488

11. In general, the liability of a witness to a like action, or his standing in the same predicament with the party sued, if the verdict cannot be given in evidence for or against him, is an interest in the question, and does not exclude him.

Id. (424) 489

12. Where a deposition has once been read in evidence without opposition, it cannot be afterwards objected to as being irregularly taken.

Evans v. Hettich, (453) 496

13. It is no objection to the competency or credibility of a witness, that he is subject to fits of derangement, if he is sane at the time of giving his testimony.

Id. (470) 500

14. The doctrine that if witnesses concur in proof of a material fact, they ought to be believed in respect to that fact, whatever may be the other contradictions in their testimony ought to be received under many qualifications and with great caution.

The Santissima Trinidad, (338) 468

15. Application of the maxim, falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus.

Id. (339) 468

16. The decisions of the board of commissioners under the acts of Congress providing for indemnification of claimants to public lands in the Mississippi Territory (commonly called the Yazoo lands), are conclusive between the parties in all cases within the jurisdiction of the commissioners.

Brown v. Jackson, (218, 237) 438, 443

17. This determination reconciled with that of the court in Brown v. Gilman, ante, Vol. IV., p. 255.

Id. (240) 444

18. The practice of the state courts cannot sanction the admission of depositions in the courts of the United States, which are not taken according to the laws of the United States, and the rules of their courts.

Evans v. Eaton, (426) 489

EVIDENCE—8.

1. Where a party claims, in the admiralty, under a condemnation in a foreign court, the libel, or other proceeding anterior to the sentence, must be produced, as well as the sentence itself.

The Nereyda, (108, 168) 574, 588

2. What evidence of proprietary interest is required on further proof.

Id. (171) 589

3. General rule, that parol testimony is not admissible to vary a written instrument.

Hunt v. Rousmanier, (174, 211) 589, 599

4. In equity, cases of fraud and mistake are exceptions to this rule.

Id. (211) 599

5. Evidence that a subscribing witness to a deed had been diligently inquired after, having gone to sea, and been absent for four years, without having been heard from, is sufficient to let in secondary proof of his handwriting.

Spring v. S. C. Ins. Co., (268, 282) 614, 617

Nicholas v. Webb, (326, 331) 628, 629

7. But it is a principle, that memorandums made by a person, in the ordinary course of his business, of acts which his duty, in such business, requires him to do for others, are, in case of his death, admissible evidence of acts so done. A fortiori, the acts of a public officer are so admissible, though they may not be strictly official, if they are according to general usage, and the ordinary course of his office.

Id. (334) 630

8. Therefore, the books of a notary public, proved to have been regularly kept, are admissible in evidence, after his decease, to prove a demand of payment, and notice of non-payment, of a promissory note.

Id. (1b.) 630

EXECUTOR AND ADMINISTRATOR—8.

1. An executor or administrator is not liable to a judgment beyond the assets to be administered, unless he pleads a false plea.

Siglar v. Haywood, (675) 713

2. If he fail to sustain his plea of plene administravit, it is not necessarily a false plea, within his own knowledge; and if it be found against him, the verdict ought to find the amount of assets unadministered, and the defendant is liable for that sum only.

Id. (1b.) 713

3. In such a case, the judgment is de bonis testatoris, and not de bonis propriis.

FRAUD—7.

1. A debtor has a right to prefer one creditor to another in payment, and his private motives for giving the preference cannot affect the exercise of the right, if the preferred creditor has done nothing improper to procure it.

Marbury v. Brooks, (565) 524

2. But any unlawful consideration, moving from the preferred creditor, to induce the preference, will avoid the deed which gives it.

Id. (577) 527

3. It is not necessary, to the validity of such a deed, that the creditors, for whose benefit it is made, should have notice of the execution of the deed, provided they afterwards assent to the provisions made for their benefit.

Id. (1b.) 527

4. Nor is it any objection to the validity of the deed, that it was made by the grantor, in the hope and expectation, that it would prevent a prosecution for a felony, connected with his transactions with his creditors; if the favored creditors have done nothing to excite that hope, and the deed was not made with their concurrence, and with a knowledge of the motives which influenced the grantor, or was not afterwards assented to by them under some express or implied engagement to suppress the prosecution.

Id. (1b.) 527

5. Nor will it be invalidated by the fact that the trustee, to whom the conveyance is made, being the father-in-law of the debtor, received the con-

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

veyance with a view of concealing the felony, and preventing a prosecution of his son-in-law, provided it was not executed with the concurrence of the cestuis que trust, and a knowledge on their part of the motives which influenced the trustee, or was not afterwards assented to by them under some engagement to suppress the prosecution.

Marbury v. Brooks, (579) 528

FRAUDS.—8.

The stat. 13 Eliz., c. 5, avoids all conveyances not deemed valuable in law, as against previous creditors; but not as against subsequent creditors, unless made with a fraudulent intent.

INSURANCE.—6.

1. Where, in a policy of insurance, a technical total loss is asserted as the ground of recovery, the loss must be occasioned by the immediate operation of some of the perils insured against, and it is not sufficient that the voyage be abandoned for fear of the operation of the peril.

Smith v. The Universal Ins. Co., (176) 235

2. The insurers do not undertake that the voyage shall be performed without delay, or that the perils insured against shall not occur; they undertake only for losses sustained by those perils; and if any peril does begin to act upon the subject, yet if it be removed before any loss takes place, and the voyage is not thereby broken up, but is, or may be resumed, the insured cannot abandon for a total loss.

Id. (116) 235

3. Insurance on munitions of war, laden on board a neutral vessel, on a voyage from New York, to and at a port or ports, place or places, in the Gulf of Mexico, from the Balize to Campeachy, both inclusive, and from either back to New York, &c., with a memorandum, that the insurers should be free from any loss arising from illicit or prohibited trade. The goods insured were prohibited from being imported into the ports of New Spain, in possession of the royalists, by the laws of Old Spain, but were permitted to be introduced into such ports as were in possession of the insurgents. The vessel and cargo arrived off a place in possession of the patriot General Mina, and the master made an agreement to sell the cargo to him, deliverable from time to time, as he should want it, at St. Ander. But before the cargo could be delivered, the vessel was chased off by Spanish armed ships, and after making several attempts to return, was compelled to proceed to the Balize for repairs; after Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

which she again approached the coast, but found it still in possession of the Royalists, General Mina having retired into the interior. The objects of the voyage being thus defeated, the vessel returned to New York with the original cargo on board; and the insured then abandoned to the underwriters, not having before had information of the breaking up of the voyage. Held, that the insured were not entitled to recover as for a total loss of the voyage.

Smith v. The Universal Ins. Co., (176) 235

4. In a claim for a technical total loss, the loss of the voyage must be occasioned by the immediate operation of a peril insured against.

Id. (185) 237

5. If a peril begins to act upon the subject, yet if it be removed before any loss takes place, and the voyage is not thereby broken up, but is or may be resumed, the insured cannot abandon for a total loss.

INSURANCE.—7.

1. Under a policy containing the following clause, "And lastly, it is agreed, that if the above vessel, upon a regular survey, should be thereby declared unseaworthy, by reason of her being unsound or rotten, then the assurers shall not be bound to pay their subscription on this policy," and it was found by the jury that the vessel was seaworthy at the time of the commencement of the risk, and when she sailed on the voyage insured, held, that proof, by a regular survey, of unsoundness at any subsequent period of the voyage, discharged the underwriters.

Dorr v. The Pacific Ins. Co., (581) 528

2. An exemplification of a condemnation of the vessel in a foreign court of vice-admiralty, reciting the certificate of surveyors, that the vessel was unworthy of being repaired, and unsafe and unfit ever to go to sea again, and produced in evidence by the insured to prove the loss, is "a regular survey," in the language of the above clause.

Id. (116) 526

3. But the survey must correspond with the contract, and if the vessel be declared unseaworthy for any additional cause, besides being "unsound or rotten," it is not conclusive evidence of unseaworthiness.

INSURANCE.—8.

1. An insurance broker is entitled to a lien on the policy for premiums paid by him on account of his principal: and though he parts with the possession, if the policy afterwards comes into his hands again, his lien is revived, unless the manner of his parting with it manifests his intention to abandon the lien. In such a case, an intermediate assignee takes cum onere.

Spring v. S. C. Ins. Co., (268, 286) 614, 618

2. But in the case of other liens acquired on the policy, if it be assigned, bona fide, for a valuable consideration, while out of the possession of the person acquiring the lien, and afterwards return into his hands, the lien does not revive as against the assignee.

3. Insurance for $18,000 on vessel valued at that sum, and $2,000 on freight valued at $12,000, on the ship Heury, "at and from Teneriffe, and at and from thence to New York, with liberty to stop at Matanzas; the property warranted American." The policy was executed in 1807; and in the same year another policy was made, by the same underwriters, on freight for the same voyage, to the amount of $10,000, and the property was also warranted American, but there was no liberty to stop at Matanzas. The following representation was made to the underwriters on the part of the plaintiff, who was both owner and master of the ship: "We are to clear out for New Orleans, the property will be under cover of Mr. John Paul, of Baltimore, who goes supercargo on board, yet Mr. Paul will only have part of the cargo to his consignment. There will be three other persons on board that will have the remainder of the cargo in their care. We are to stop at the Matanzas, to know if there are any men-of-war off the Havana." The vessel sailed from Teneriffe on the 17th of April, 1807, with a cargo belonging to Spanish subjects, but appearing to be the property of John Paul Dumeste, a citizen of the United States, and the same person called John Paul in the representation. The cargo was shipped under a charter-party executed by the plaintiff and Dumeste, representing New Orleans as the place of destination. The ship arrived at the Havana on the 7th of July, having put into Matanzas to avoid British cruisers, and unladed the cargo, which was there received by the Spanish owners, and the freight, amounting to $7,000, paid to the plaintiff, who received it "in full of all demands, for freight or otherwise, under or by virtue of the aforesaid charter-party and cargo." At the Havana the ship took in a new cargo, belonging to merchants in New York, and was lost, with the greater part of the cargo, on the voyage from Havana to New York. An action of debt was brought on the first policy for the value of the ship and freight. The sum demanded in the writ was $20,000, but the plaintiff limited his demand at the trial to $18,000 on the ship, and $420 for the freight actually earned on the voyage from Havana to New York. Held, that he was entitled to recover.

1. By a charter-party, the sum of $30,000 was agreed to be paid for the use or hire of the ship, on a voyage from Philadelphia to Madeira, and thence to Bombay, and at the option of the charterer to Calcutta, and back to Philadelphia (with an addition of $2,000 if she should proceed to Calcutta), the whole payable on the return of the ship to Philadelphia, and before the discharge of her cargo there, in approved notes, not exceeding an average time of ninety days from the time at which she should be ready to discharge her cargo. The charterer proceeded in the ship to Calcutta, and, with the consent of the master (who was appointed by the ship-owners), entered into an agreement with P. & Co., merchants there, that if they would make him an advance of money, he would deliver to them a bill of lading, stipulating for the delivery of the goods purchased therewith to their agents in Philadelphia, free of freight, who should be authorized to sell the same, and apply the proceeds to the repayment of the said advance, unless the charterer's bills drawn on G. & S., of Philadelphia, should be accepted, in which event the agents of P. & Co. should deliver the goods to the charterer. The goods were shipped accordingly, and a bill of lading signed by the master, with the clause, "freight for the said goods having been settled here." The bills of exchange drawn by the charterer were refused acceptance, and the agents of P. & Co. demanded the goods, which the owners of the ship refused to deliver without the payment of freight. Held, that the owners of the ship had a lien on these goods for the freight.

LOCAL LAW—5.

1. Under the laws of Tennessee, where lands are sold by a summary proceeding for the payment of taxes, it is essential to the validity of the sale and of the deed made thereon, that every fact necessary to give the court jurisdiction should appear upon the record.

M'Clung v. Ross, (116, 119) 46, 48

2. Under the statute of limitations of Tennessee, the running of the statute can only be stopped by actual suit, if the party claiming under it has peaceable possession for seven years. But such possession cannot exist if the party having the better right takes actual possession in pursuance of his right.

Id., (121) 49

3. One tenant in common may oust his co-tenant, and hold in severalty; but a silent possession, unaccompanied by any act amounting to an ouster, or giving notice to the co-tenant that his possession is adverse, cannot be construed into an adverse possession.

Id., (124) 50

4. The statute of limitations of Tennessee does not, like other statutes of limitation, protect a mere naked possession, but its operation is limited to a possession acquired and held under a grant, or a deed founded on a grant.

Id. Note 1, (121) 49

5. Previous to the year 1775, H. S., of Virginia, cohabited with A. W., and had by her the appellants, whom he recognized as his children. In July, 1775, he made his will, which was duly proved after his decease, in which he described them as the children of himself, and of his wife A., and devised the whole of his property to them and their mother. In June, 1776, he was appointed a Colonel in the Virginia line, upon the continental establishment, and died in the service, having, in July, 1776, intermarried with the mother, and died, leaving her pregnant with a child who was afterwards born, and named R. S. After the death of H. S., and the birth of his posthumous son, a warrant for a tract of military lands was granted by the state of Virginia to the posthumous son R. S., who died in 1796, in his minority, without wife or children, and without having located or disposed of the warrant.

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

His mother also died before 1796. Held, that the children of H. S. were not entitled to the lands, as devisees under his will, under the act of Assembly; nor did the will so far operate as to render them capable of taking under the act, as being named his legal representatives in the will.

Stevenson's Heirs v. Sullivan,

(207, 255) 70, 82

6. The appellants were not legitimated by the marriage of H. S. with their mother, and his recognition of them as his children, under the 19th sec. of the act of descents of Virginia, of 1785, which took effect on the 1st of January, 1787, and provides, that "where a man, having by a woman one or more children, shall afterwards intermarry with such woman, such child or children, if recognized by him, shall be thereby legitimated."

(257) 82

7. The appellants were not, as illegitimate children of H. S. and A. W., capable of inheriting from R. S. under the 18th sec. of the same act of descents, which provides that, "In making title by descent, it shall be no bar to a party that any ancestor, through whom he derives his descent from the intestate is, or hath been, an alien. Bastards also shall be capable of inheriting, or of transmitting inheritance, on the part of their mother, as if they had been lawfully begotten of such mother."

8. The following entry is invalid for want of that certainty and precision required by law: "William Perkins and William Hoy enter 6,714 acres of land on a treasury warrant, No. 10,692; to join L. Thompson and James M'Millan's entry of 1,000 acres that is laid on the adjoining ridge, between Spencer's Creek and Hingston's fork of Licking, on the east, and to run east and south for quantity." The entry referred to in the foregoing was as follows: "9th of December, 1782, Lawrence Thompson and James M'Millan, assignee of Samuel Baker, enter 1,000 acres on a treasury warrant, No. 4,222, on the dividing ridge between Hingston's fork of Licking, and Spencer's Creek, a west branch of said fork, to include a large pond, in the centre of a square, and a white oak tree marked X, also an elm tree marked VS, near the side of the pond."

Perkins et al. v. Ramsey,

(269) 84

9. There are cases in which a grant is absolutely void; as where the state has no title to the thing granted, or where the officer had no authority to issue the grant, &c. In such cases, the validity of the grant is necessarily examinable at law.

Polk's Lessee v. Wendell,

(293, 303) 92, 94

10. A grant raises a presumption that every prerequisite to its issuing has been complied with, and a warrant is evidence of the existence of an entry; but where the entry has never in fact been made, and the warrant is forged, no right accrues under the act of North Carolina of 1777, and the grant is void.

(303) 94

11. Where a party, in order to prove that there were no entries to authorize the issuing of the warrants, offered to give in evidence certified copies of warrants from the same office, of the same dates and numbers, but to different persons, and for different quantities of land. Held, that this was competent evidence to prove the positive fact of the existence of the entries specified in the copies; but that in order to have a negative effect in disproving the entries alleged to be spurious, the whole abstract ought to be produced in court, or inspected under a commission, or the keeper of the document examined as a witness, from which the court might ascertain the fact of the non-existence of the contested entries.

(310) 96

12. In such a case, certificates from the secretary's office of North Carolina, introduced to prove, that on entries of the same dates with those alleged to be spurious, other warrants issued, and other grants were obtained in the names of various individuals, but none to the party claiming under the alleged spurious entries, is competent circumstantial evidence to be left to the jury. In such a case, parol evidence that the warrants and locations had been rejected by the entry-taker as spurious, is inadmissible.

(311) 96

13. It seems, that whether a grant be absolutely void, or voidable only, a junior grantee is not, by the law of Tennessee, permitted to avail himself of its nullity as against an innocent purchaser without notice.

14. The 17th section of the act, incorporating the Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, providing, "that all bills, bonds, notes and every other contract or engagement on behalf of the corporation, shall be signed by the president, and countersigned by the cashier; and the funds of the corporation, shall, in no case, be liable for any contract or engagement, unless the same shall be signed and countersigned as aforesaid," does not extend to contracts and undertakings, implied in law.

Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia,

(326, 335) 100, 103

15. It is essential to the validity of a grant, that the thing granted should be so described as to be capable of being distinguished from other things of the same kind. But it is not necessary that the grant itself should contain such a description, as without the aid of extrinsic testimony to ascertain precisely what is conveyed.

Blake v. Doherty,

(359, 362) 109, 110

16. Natural objects called for in a grant may be proved by testimony, not found in the grant, but consistent with it.

Id.

17. The following description, in a patent of the land granted, is not void for uncertainty, but may be made certain by extrinsic testimony: "A tract of land in our middle district, on the west fork of Cane Creek, the waters of Elk River, beginning at a hickory, running north 1,000 poles to a white oak; then east, 800 poles, to a stake; thence west 800 poles to the beginning, as her plat herunto annexed doth appear."

Id.

(359) 109

18. The plat and certificate of survey annexed to the patent, and a copy of the entry on which the survey was made, are admissible in evidence for this purpose.

Id.

(364) 110

19. A general plan made by authority, conformably to an act of the local legislature, may also be submitted, with other evidence, to the jury, to avail quantum valere potest, in ascertaining boundary.

(1b.) 110

20. But a demarcation, or private survey, made by direction of a party interested under the grant, is inadmissible evidence, because it would enable the grantee to fix a vagrant grant by his own act.

(365) 110

21. The boundary of the state of Kentucky extends only to low water-mark on the western side of the river Ohio; and does not include a peninsula, or island, on the western or north-western bank, separated from the main land by a channel or bayou, which is filled with water only when the river rises above its banks, and is, at other times, dry.

Handly's Lessee v. Anthony,

(374) 113

22. When a river is the boundary between two nations or states, if the property is in neither, and there be no convention respecting it, each holds to the middle of the stream. But when, as in this case, one state (Virginia) is the original proprietor, and grants the territory on one side only, it retains the river within its domain, and the newly-erected state extends to the river only, and the low water-mark is its boundary.

LOCAL LAW—6.

1. The Circuit Court for the District of Columbia has authority to adjourn to a distant day, and the adjourned session is considered as the same term.

Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria v. Withers, (106) 217

2. Where the regular term began on the 3d Monday in April, and the court continued to sit, de die in diem, until the 16th of May, when it adjourned to the 4th Monday of June. Held, that a defendant, against whom an office judgment had been entered on the 16th of May, had a right, under the laws and practice of Virginia, to appear at the adjourned session, and have the default set aside, on giving special bail, and pleading issuably.

Id. (Ib.) 217

3. Under the act of assembly of Virginia, the defendant may enter special bail, and defend the suit at any time before the entering up of judgment upon a writ of inquiry executed; and the appearance of the defendant, or the entry of special bail, before such judgment, discharges the appearance bail.

Bartle v. Coleman, (475) 309

4. If the defendant does not appear, or give special bail, the appearance bail may defend the suit, and is liable to the same judgment as the defendant would have been liable to; but the defendant cannot appear and consent to a reference, the report and judgment on which is to bind the appearance bail as well as himself. Such a joint judgment is erroneous, and will be reversed as to both.

Id. (Ib.) 309

5. The third section of the act of Congress, of March 30th, 1803, for the relief of insolvent debtors in the District of Columbia, does not create any express or implied exception to the operation of the statute of limitations, by making the insolvent a trustee for his creditors, in respect to his future property, or by making any demand, included in the schedule of his debts, a debt of record.

Bowie v. Henderson, (514) 319

6. The including of a demand in the schedule of the insolvent's debts, is sufficient evidence to sustain an issue on a replication of a new promise to the plea of the statute of limitations, if the period of limitation has not elapsed after the date of the schedule.

Id. (Ib.) 319

7. The decision of this court, in Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148, revised and confirmed.

Kerr v. Watts, (550) 328

8. The rule applied in equity to the relief of bona fide purchasers without notice, is not applicable to the case of purchasers of military land warrants under the laws of Virginia.

Id. (Ib.) 328

9. Such purchasers are considered as affected with notice by the record of the entry, and also of the survey; and subsequent purchasers are considered as acquiring the interest of the person making the entry; so that purchasers under conflicting entries are considered as purchasing under distinct rights, in which case the rule, as to innocent purchasers, does not apply.

Id. (Ib.) 328

10. The principle, that only parties, or privies, or purchasers pedente lite, are bound by a decree in equity, how applied to this case.

Id. (Ib.) 328

11. The surveys actually made on the military land warrants of Virginia, have not the force of judicial acts, or of acts done by the deputations of officers as general agents of the continental officers.

Id. (Ib.) 328

12. A power to convey lands must possess the same requisites, and observe the same solemnities, as are necessary in a deed directly conveying the lands.

Clark v. Graham, (577) 334

13. A title to lands can only be acquired and lost according to the laws of the state in which they are situate.

Id. (Ib.) 334

14. The laws of Ohio require all deeds of land to be executed in the presence of two witnesses, and a deed executed in the presence of one witness only is void. Id. (Ib.) 334

15. It is a universal rule, that course and distance yield to natural and ascertained objects.

Preston's Heirs v. Bowmar, (580) 336

16. But where these objects are wanting, and the course and distance cannot be reconciled, there is no universal rule that obliges us to prefer the one to the other.

Preston's Heirs v. Bowmar, (Ib.) 336

17. Cases may exist in which the one or the other may be preferred according to the circumstances.

Id. (Ib.) 336

18. In a case of doubtful construction, the claim of the party in actual possession ought to be maintained, especially where it has been upheld by the decisions of the state tribunals.

Id. (Ib.) 336

19. The power given to the corporation of Georgetown, by the act of Maryland, of November, 1797, c. 56, to graduate the streets of that city, is a continuing power, and the corporation may from time to time alter the graduations so made.

Goszler v. The Corporation of Georgetown,
(593) 339

20. The ordinance of May, 1799, by which the corporation of Georgetown first exercised the power of graduating the streets, is not in the nature of a compact, and may be altered by the corporation.

Id. (Ib.) 339

21. Under the laws in relation to the Mutual Assurance Society of Virginia, property offered for insurance, on which the premium has not been paid, and which is sold without notice, is not liable for the premium in the hands of the vendee.

The Mutual Assurance Society v. Faxon,
(606) 342

22. The execution by a public officer of a power to sell lands for the non-payment of taxes, must be in strict pursuance of the law under which it is made, or no title is conveyed.

Thatcher v. Powell, (119) 221

23. It is essential to the validity of the sale of lands for taxes, under the laws of Tennessee, that it should appear on the record of the court, by which the order of sale is made, that the sheriff had returned that there were no goods and chattels of the delinquent proprietor, out of which the taxes could be made.

Id. (Ib.) 221

24. The publications which are required by law to be made, subsequent to the sheriff's return, and previous to the order of sale, are indispensable preliminaries to a valid order of sale.

Id. (Ib.) 221

25. In summary proceedings, where a court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute, which prescribes its course, that course ought to be strictly pursued, and the facts which give jurisdiction, ought to appear on the face of the record. Otherwise the proceedings are not merely voidable, but absolutely void, as being coram non jndice.

Id. (Ib.) 221

26. In construing local statutes respecting real property, this court is governed by the decisions of the state tribunals.

Id. (Ib.) 221

27. As by the laws of Louisiana, questions of fact in civil cases are tried by the court, unless either of the parties demand a jury; in an action of debt on a judgment, the interest on the original judgment may be computed, and make part of the judgment in Louisiana, without a writ of inquiry and the interventions of a jury.

LOCAL LAW—7.

1. A warrant and survey authorize the proprietor of them to demand the legal title, but do not, in themselves, constitute a legal title; until the consummation of the title by a grant, the person who acquires an equity holds a right, subject to examination.

Miller v. Kerr, (1) 381

2. Where the register of the land-office of Virginia had, by mistake, given a warrant for military services in the Continental line, on a certificate authorizing a warrant for services in the state line, and in recording it, pursued the certificate, and not the warrant, it was held that this court could not support a prior entry and survey, on a warrant thus issued by mistake, against a senior patent.

Id. (Ib.) 381

3. Where the plaintiffs seek to set aside the legal title, because they have the superior equity, it is consistent with the principles of the court to rebut this equity by any circumstances which may impair it; and the legal title cannot be made to yield to an equity founded on the mistake of a ministerial officer.

Id. (6) 382

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

4. Where plats are returned and grants made, without an actual survey, the rule of construction which has been adopted, in order to settle the conflicting claims of different parties, is, that the most material, and most certain calls shall control those which are less material and less certain.

Newson v. Pryor, (7) 382

5. A call for a natural object, as a river, a known stream, a spring, or even a marked line, shall control both course and distance.

Id. (10) 383

6. There is no distinction between a call to stop at a river, and a call to cross a river.

Id. (12) 384

7. Where a grant was made for 5,000 acres of land, "lying on both sides of the two main forks of Duck River, beginning, &c., and running thence west 894 poles, to a white oak, thence south 894 poles, to a stake, crossing the river, thence east 894 poles, to a stake, thence north 894 poles, to the beginning, crossing the south fork;" it was held, that it must be surveyed so as to extend the second line of the grant such a distance on the course called for as would cross Duck River to the opposite bank.

Id. (1b.) 384

8. Under the laws of Massachusetts and Connecticut, the power of the administrator to sell the real estate for the payment of debts must be exercised within a reasonable time, which is to be fixed by analogy to the statute of limitations.

Ricard v. Williams, (59, 115) 397, 412

Bouldin v. Massie, (122, 148) 414, 420

10. The loss of a paper must be established before its contents can be proved; but where the patent issues upon an assignment of the warrant, and the legal title is thus consummated, the assignment itself being no longer a paper essential to that title, the same degree of proof of its existence cannot be required as if it were relied on as composing part of the title.

Id. (154) 422

11. Where there is a strong degree of probability that the assignment has been lost or destroyed, through accident, its non-production, by the party claiming under it, ought not to operate against him so as to defeat his legal title.

Id. (155) 422

12. The original law of Virginia, which authorizes the assignment of warrants, did not require that it should be made by indorsement, or by an instrument annexed to the warrant.

Id. (156) 422

13. It is a rule, both at law and in equity, that a party must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of his adversary's title.

Watts v. Lindsey, (158, 161) 423, 424

14. To support an entry, the party claiming under it must show that the objects called for are so described, or are so notorious, that others, by using reasonable diligence, can readily find them.

Id. (161) 424

15. The following entry was pronounced under the circumstances, to be void for uncertainty: "7th of August, 1787. Capt. Ferdinand O'Neal enters 1,000 acres, &c., on the waters of the Ohio, beginning at the north-west corner of Stephen T. Mason's entry, No. 654, thence with his line east 400 poles, north 400 poles, west 400 poles, south 400 poles." The entry of Stephen T. Mason referred to, being as follows: "7th of August, 1787. Stephen T. Mason, Assignee, &c., enters 100 acres of land on part of a military warrant, No. 2012, on the waters of the Ohio, beginning 640 poles north from the mouth of the third creek running into the Ohio, above the mouth of the Little Miami River; thence running west 160 poles; north 400 poles; east 400 poles; thence to the beginning."

Id. (159) 423

16. The Ohio and Little Miami Rivers are indented and notorious objects.

Id. (161) 424

17. But the third creek above the mouth of the Little Miami is to be taken according to the numerical order of the creeks, unless some other stream has by general reputation or notoriety been so considered.

Id. (162) 424

18. Cross Creek, the stream which the party claiming under O'Neal's entry assumed for the beginning to run the 640 poles north from the mouth of the third creek, as called for in Mason's entry, not being in fact numerically the third creek above Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

the mouth of the Little Miami, and there being no satisfactory proof that it had acquired that designation by reputation—the claim was pronounced invalid.

19. A statute, for the commencement of which no time is fixed, commences from its date.

Matthews v. Zane, (164, 211) 425, 436

20. The lands included within the Zanesville District, by the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1803, c. 343, s. 6, could not, after that date, be sold at the Marietta land-office.

Id. (209) 436

21. The decision of this court in Matthews v. Zane, 5 Cranch, 92, revised and confirmed.

Id. (1b.) 436

22. A patent is a title from its date, and conclusive against all those whose rights did not commence previous to its emanation.

Hoofnagle v. Anderson, (212, 214) 437

23. Courts of equity consider an entry as the commencement of title, and will sustain a valid entry against a patent founded on a prior defective entry, if issued after such valid entry was made.

Id. (214) 437

24. But they never sustain an entry made after the date of the patent.

Id. (215) 437

25. The above case attempted to be taken out of the general rule upon the ground that the equity of the party claiming under the entry commenced before the legal title of the other party was consummated.

Id. (1b.) 437

26. But the circumstances of the case, and the equity arising out of it, were not deemed by the court sufficient to take it out of the general rule.

Id. (1b.) 437

27. The owner of a survey made in conformity with his entry, and not interfering with any other person's right, may abandon his survey after it has been recorded.

Taylor v. Myers, (23) 387

28. The proviso in the act of Congress of March 2d, 1807, c. 76, s. 1, which annuls all locations made on lands previously surveyed, applies to subsisting surveys, to those in which an interest is claimed; not to those which have been abandoned, and in which no person has an interest.

Id. (1b.) 377

29. A question on the validity of a certificate for a settlement right in Kentucky, and of the entry thereof in the surveyor's office.

Crocket v. Lee, (522) 513

30. It is a settled rule, that the decree must conform to the allegations in the pleadings, as well as the proofs in the cause.

Id. (525) 514

31. Therefore, when the question is on the validity of a location, and neither its vagueness nor its certainty are distinctly put in issue by the pleadings, the testimony to that point will be disregarded by this court; but if the merits appear to justify it, the cause will be remanded to the court below, with directions to permit the pleadings to be amended.

Id. (1b.) 514

32. The turnpike road stock, paid in as a part of the capital of the Union Bank of Alexandria, before its incorporation, became the common property of the association, so as to be subject to be sold and distributed among the members, after the charter, which directed that the capital stock should consist of money only, was accepted; and those who subscribed the road stock, or their assignees, are not entitled to have the same returned specifically to them.

Holbrook v. Union Bank of Alex., (553) 521

LOCAL LAW—8.

1. Under the act of assembly of Maryland of 1795 (c. 56), if the defendant appears, and dissolves the attachment, a declaration and subsequent pleadings are not necessary, as in other actions, but the cause may be tried upon a short note.

Goldsbrough v. Orr, (217) 600

2. It seems, under the same act, that an attachment will not lie in a case ex contractu for unliquidated damages for the non-delivery of goods. But where the plaintiff is entitled to a stipulated sum of money, in lieu of a specific article to be delivered, an attachment will lie.

Id. (226) 603

3. Note of the case of Smith v. Gilmor, in the Court of Appeals of Maryland.

Id. Note 3. (227) 603

Sneed v. Wister, (690) 717

5. The party is as well entitled to interest in an action on an appeal bond as if he were to proceed on the judgment, if the judgment be on a contract for the payment of money. He is entitled to interest from the rendition of the original judgment.

PATENT—7.

1. A party cannot entitle himself to a patent for more than his own invention; and if the patent be for the whole of a machine, he can maintain a title to it only by establishing that it is substantially new in its structure and mode of operation.

Evans v. Eaton, (356, 428) 472, 490

2. If the same combination existed before in machines of the same nature, up to a certain point, and the party's invention consists in adding some new machinery, or some improved mode of operation, to the old, the patent should be limited to such improvement; for if it includes the whole machine, it includes more than his invention, and therefore cannot be supported.

Id. (430) 490

3. When the patent is for an improvement, the nature and extent of the improvement must be stated in the specification, and it is not sufficient that it be made out and shown at the trial, or established by comparing the machine specified in the patent with former machines in use.

Id. (432) 491

4. The former judgment of this court in the same case, (ante, Vol. III., p. 454) commented on, explained, and confirmed.

Id. (428) 490

5. It is no objection to the competency of a witness in a patent cause that he is sued in another action for an infringement of the same patent.

Evans v. Hettich, (453, 468) 496, 500

6. The 6th section of the patent act of 1793, c. 156, which requires a notice of the special matter to be given in evidence by the defendant under the general issue, does not include all the matters of defense which the defendant may be legally entitled to make. And where the witness was asked, whether the machine used by the defendant was like the model exhibited in court of the plaintiff's patented machine, held, that no notice was necessary to authorize the inquiry.

PAYMENT—7.

1. A person owing money under distinct contracts, has a right to apply his payments to whichever debt he may choose, and this power may be exercised without any express direction given at the time.

Taylor v. Sandiford, (13, 19) 384, 386

2. A direction may be evidenced by circumstances, as well as by words; and a positive refusal to pay one debt, and an acknowledgment of another, with a delivery of the sum due upon it, would be such a circumstance.

PENAL STATUTES—5.

Though penal laws are to be construed strictly, yet the intention of the legislature must govern in the construction of penal, as well as other statutes, and they are not to be construed so strictly as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature.

United States v. Wittberger, (76, 95) 37, 42

PIRACY—5.

1. A commission issued by Aury, as "Brigadier of the Mexican republic" (a republic whose existence is unknown and unacknowledged), or as "Generalissimo of the Floridas" (a province in the possession of Spain), will not authorize armed vessels to make captures at sea.

United States v. Klintock, (144, 149) 55, 56

2. Quere. Whether a person acting with good faith under such a commission may be guilty of piracy.

Id. (149) 56

3. However this may be, in general, under the particular circumstances of this case, showing that the seizure was made, not jure belli, but animo furandi, the commission was held not to exempt the prisoner from the charge of piracy.

Id. (150) 56

4. The opinion of this court in the case of the United States v. Palmer, ante, Vol. III., p. 610, commented on and explained.

Id. (1b.) 56

5. The act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, s. 8, extends to all persons, on board all vessels, which throw off their national character by cruising piratically, and committing piracy on other vessels.

United States v. Furlong et al., (184, 192) 64, 66

6. The act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, sec. 5, referring to the law of nations for a definition of the crime of piracy, is a constitutional exercise of the power of Congress to define and punish that crime.

United States v. Smith, (153, 157) 57, 58

7. The crime of piracy is defined by the law of nations with reasonable certainty.

Id. (160) 58

8. Robbery, or forcible depredation upon the sea, animo furandi, is piracy by the law of nations and by the act of Congress.

United States v. Furlong et al., (184) 64

9. Citations to show that piracy is defined by the law of nations.

United States v. Smith, note 4, (163) 59

10. The 8th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, is not repealed by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, c. 76, to protect the commerce of the United States, and to punish the crime of piracy.

United States v. Furlong, alias Hobson et al., (184, 192) 64, 66

11. In an indictment for a piratical murder (under the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, sec. 8), it is not necessary that it should allege the prisoner to be a citizen of the United States, nor that the crime was committed on board a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States; but is sufficient to charge it as committed from on board such a vessel, by a mariner sailing on board such a vessel.

Id. (194) 67

12. The words "out of the jurisdiction of any particular state," in the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, sec. 8, are construed to mean out of the jurisdiction of any particular state of the Union.

Id. (200) 68

13. A vessel lying in an open roadstead of a foreign country, is "upon the high seas" within the act of 1790, c. 36, sec. 8.

Id. (1b.) 68

14. A citizen of the United States fitting out a vessel in a port of the United States, to cruise against a power in amity with the United States, is not protected by a foreign commission from punishment for any offense committed against the property of citizens of the United States.

Id. (201) 68

15. The courts of the United States have jurisdiction under the act of the 30th of April, 1790, c. 36, of murder or robbery committed on the high seas, although not committed on board a vessel belonging to citizens of the United States, as if she had no

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

United States v. Holmes, (412, 416) 122, 123

16. In the same case, and under the same act, if the offense be committed on board of a foreign vessel by a citizen of the United States; or on board a vessel of the United States by a foreigner; or by a citizen or foreigner on board of a piratical vessel, the offense is equally cognizable by the courts of the United States.

Id. (417) 123.

17. It makes no difference in such a case, and under the same act, whether the offense was committed on board of a vessel, or in the sea, as by throwing the deceased overboard and drowning him, or by shooting him when in the sea though he was not thrown overboard.

Id. (418) 123

18. In such a case, and under the same act, where the vessel, from on board of which the offense was committed, sailed from Buenos Ayres where she had enlisted her crew; but it did not appear by legal proof that she had a commission from the government of Buenos Ayres, or any ship's papers or documents from that government, or that she was ever recognized as a ship of that nation, or of its subjects, or who were the owners, where they resided, or when or where the vessel was armed or equipped; but it did appear in proof that the captain and crew were chiefly Englishmen, Frenchmen, and citizens of the United States; that the captain was by birth a citizen of the United States, domiciled at Baltimore, where the privateer was built. Held, that the burthen of proof of the national character of the vessel was on the prisoners.

19. Late act of Congress for the punishment of piracy.

PLEADING—6.

See Practice, 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10.

PLEADING—8.

1. It is, in general, not necessary, in deriving title to a bill or note, through the indorsement of a partnership firm, or from the surviving partner, through the act of the law, to state particularly the names of the persons composing the firm.

Childress v. Emory, (642) 705

2. A declaration, averring that "J. C., by his agent, A. C., made" the note, &c., is good.

Id. (1b.) 705

3. A general profert of letters testamentary, is sufficient; and if the defendant would object to their insufficiency, he must crave oyer; or, if it be alleged that the plaintiffs are not executors, the objection must be taken by plea in abatement.

Id. (1b.) 705

4. Debt, against an executor, should be in the detinet only, unless he has made himself personally responsible, as by a devastavit.

Id. (1b.) 705

5. An action of debt lies, upon a promissory note, against executors.

Id. (1b.) 705

6. The wager of law, if it ever had a legal existence in the United States, is now completely abolished.

Id. (1b.) 705

7. Oyer is not demandable of a record; nor, in an action upon a bond for performance of covenants in another deed, can oyer of such deed be craved; for the defendant, and not the plaintiff, must show it, with a profert of it, or an excuse for the omission.

Sneed v. Wister, (690) 717

8. If oyer be improperly demanded, the defect is aided on a general demurrer; but it is fatal to the plea, where it is set down as a cause of demurrer.

Id. (1b.) 717

9. Nil Debet is an improper plea to an action of debt upon a specialty or deed, where it is the foundation of the action.

PRACTICE—5.

1. An information for a quo warranto, to try the title to an office, cannot be maintained but at the instance of the governments; and the consent of the parties will not give jurisdiction in such a case.

Wallace v. Anderson, (291) 91

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8.

2. The District Judge cannot sit in the Circuit Court in a cause brought by writ of error from the District to the Circuit Court, and the cause cannot in such a case be brought from the Circuit to this court upon a certificate of a division of opinion of the judges.

See Prize, 2, 3, 5, 11.

PRACTICE—6.

1. An equity suit, where an appeal has been taken from the Circuit Court to this court, but not prosecuted, will be dismissed upon producing a certificate from the court below, that the appeal has been taken and not prosecuted.

Randolph v. Barber, (128) 223

2. A decree of the highest court of equity of a state, affirming the decretal order of an inferior court of equity of the same state, refusing to dissolve an injunction granted on the filing of the bill, is not a final decree within the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, from which an appeal lies to this court.

Gibbons v. Ogden, (448) 302

3. In order to maintain a suit in the Circuit Court, the jurisdiction must appear on the record; as if the suit is between citizens of different states, the citizenship of the respective parties must be set forth.

Sullivan v. The Fulton Steamboat Company, (450) 303

4. An admiralty suit, where an appeal has been taken from the Circuit Court to this court, but not prosecuted, will be dismissed, upon producing a certificate from the court below, that the appeal has been taken, and not prosecuted.

The Jonquille, (452) 303

Hughes v. Blake, (453, 468) 303, 307

6. In an equity cause, the res in litigation may be sold by order of the Circuit Court, and the proceeds invested in stocks, notwithstanding the pendency of an appeal to this court.

Spring v. The South Carolina Insurance Co., (519) 320

7. In real or personal actions, at common law, the death of parties, before judgment, abates the suit; and it requires the aid of some statutory provision, like that of the 31st section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, to enable the suit to be prosecuted by, or against the personal representative or heir of the deceased, where the cause of action survives.

Green v. Watkins, (260) 256

8. In writs of error upon judgments already rendered, in personal actions, if the plaintiff in error dies before assignment of errors, the writ abates at common law; but if after assignment of errors, the defendant may join in error, and proceed to get the judgment affirmed, if not erroneous, and may then revive it against the representatives of the plaintiff.

Id. (1b.) 256

9. But a writ of error in personal actions, does not abate by the death of the defendant in error, whether it happen before or after errors assigned; and the personal representatives may not only be admitted voluntarily to become parties, but a seire facias may issue to compel them.

Id. (1b.) 256

10. By the rules of this court, if either party, in real or personal actions, die, pending the writ of error, his representatives in the personality or realty, may voluntarily become parties, or may be compelled to become parties, in the manner prescribed by the rule.

PRACTICE—7.

1. This court will not grant a rehearing in an equity cause, after it has been remitted to the court below to carry into effect the decree of this court, according to its mandate.

Brouder v. McArthur, (58) 397

2. In cases brought to this court by appeal from the highest state court under the 25th section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, this court is confined to an examination of the right, title, claim, or exemption, set up by the party as depending upon the construction of the law or treaty, &c., of the United States, under which it is set up.

Matthews v. Zane, (206) 435

3. Note on the appellate jurisdiction of this court in cases arising in the state courts under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States.

Matthews v. Zane, Note 1, (1*b.*) 435

4. Inconvenient and unnecessary practice of spreading the judge's charge in extenso, upon the record.

Evans v. Eaton, (426) 489

5. In real actions, the death of the ancestor, without having appeared to the suit, abates the suit, and it cannot be revived and prosecuted against the heirs of the original defendant.

Macker's Heirs v. Thomas, (530) 515

6. If the heirs be made parties by order of the court in which the suit is brought, and judgment is entered against them by default for want of a plea, upon a summons and count against the original defendant, they may sue out a writ of error, and reverse the judgment.

PRACTICE—8.

1. The appellate jurisdiction of this court, under the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, may be exercised by a writ of error, issued by the clerk of a circuit court, under the seal of that court, in the form prescribed by the act of the 8th of May, 1792, c. 137, s. 9; and the writ itself need not expressly state that it is directed to a final judgment of the state court, or that the court is the highest court of law or equity of the state.

Buel v. Van Ness, (312, 320) 624, 626

2. It is not necessary to aver on the record that the defendant in the Circuit Court was an inhabitant of the district, or was found therein at the time of serving the writ. Where the defendant appears, without taking the exception, it is an admission of the regularity of the service.

PRIZE—5.

1. A question of proprietary interest on farther proof. Restitution decreed.

The Venus, (127, 130) 50, 51

2. Captor's costs and expenses ordered to be paid by the claimant, it being his fault that defective documents were put on board.

Id. (131) 51

3. On farther proof, the affidavit of the claimant is indispensably necessary.

Id. (127) 50

4. A question of proprietary interest on farther proof. Restitution decreed, with costs and expenses to be paid by the claimant.

The London Packet, (132) 52

5. In general, the circumstance of goods being found on board an enemy's ship raises a legal presumption that they are enemy's property.

Id. (137) 53

6. Upon a piratical capture, the property remains in the original owners, and cannot be forfeited for the misconduct of the captors in violating the municipal laws of the country where the vessel seized by them is carried.

The Josefa Segunda, (338, 357) 104, 108

7. But where the capture is made by a regularly commissioned captor, he acquires a title to the captured property, which can only be divested by recapture, or by the sentence of a competent tribunal of his own country; and the property is subject to forfeiture for a violation, by the captor, of the revenue or other municipal laws of the neutral country into which the prize may be carried.

Id. (358) 108

8. Quere, Whether, when a prize has been taken by a privateer fitted out in violation of our neutrality, the vessels of the United States have a right to recapture the prize, and bring it into our ports for adjudication.

La Amistad de Rues, (385, 388) 115, 116

9. In cases of marine torts, the probable profits of the voyage are not a fit rule for the ascertainment of damages.

Id. (389) 116

10. In cases of violation of our neutrality by any of the belligerents, if the prize comes voluntarily within our territory, it is restored to the original owners by our courts. But their jurisdiction for this purpose, under the law of nations, extends only to restitution of the specific property, with costs and expenses during the pendency of the suit, and does not extend to the infliction of vindictive damages, as in ordinary cases of marine torts.

La Amistad de Rues, (1*b.*) 116

11. Where the original owner seeks for restitution in our courts upon the ground of a violation of our neutrality by the captors, the onus probandi rests upon him, and if there be reasonable doubt respecting the facts, the court will decline to exercise its jurisdiction.

Id. (391) 117

12. A question of proprietary interest on farther proof.

The Atalanta, (433) 127

13. Note on the subject of prize law.

Appendix, Note III., (52) 146

14. Prize chapters of the Consolato del Mare.

Id. (54) 147

15. Extracts from the French Prize Ordinance of 1400.

26. Ordinances of Congress from 1775 to 1782.

Id. (103) 163

27. British Statutes and Prize Instructions.

Id. (129) 171

28. Additional documents on the neutrality maintained by the United States during the present war between Spain and her American colonies.

Id. Note V., (151) 180

PRIZE—6.

1. Whether the capture is made by a duly commissioned captor, or not, is a question between the government and the captor, with which the claimant has nothing to do.

The Amiable Isabella, (1, 66) 191, 207

2. If the capture be made by a non-commissioned captor, the government may contest the right of the captor after a decree of condemnation, and before a distribution of the prize proceeds; and the condemnation must be to the government.

Id. (1*b.*) 207

3. The 17th article of the Spanish treaty of 1795, so far as it purports to give any effect to passports, is imperfect and inoperative, in consequence of the omission to annex the form of passport to the treaty.

Id. (69) 207

4. Quere, Whether, if the form had been annexed, and the passport were obtained by fraud, and upon false suggestions, it would have the conclusive effect attributed to it by the treaty.

Id. (1*b.*) 207

5. Quere, Whether sailing under enemy's convoy be a substantive cause of condemnation.

Id. (1*b.*) 207

6. By the Spanish treaty of 1795, free ships make free goods; but the form of the passport, by which the freedom of the ship was to have been conclusively established, never having been duly annexed to the treaty, the proprietary interest of the ship is to be proved according to the ordinary rules of the prize court, and if thus shown to be Spanish, will protect the cargo on board, to whomsoever the latter may belong.

Id. (1*b.*) 207

7. By the rules of the prize court, the onus probandi of a neutral interest rests on the claimant.

Id. (77) 209

Wheat. 5, 6, 7, 8

8. The evidence to acquit or condemn must come, in the first instance, from the ship's papers, and the examination of the captured persons.

The Amiable Isabella, (Ib.) 209

9. Where these are not satisfactory, farther proof may be admitted, if the claimant has not forfeited his right to it by a breach of good faith.

Id. (Ib.) 209

10. On the production of farther proof, if the neutrality of the property is not established beyond reasonable doubt, condemnation follows.

Id. (Ib.) 209

11. The assertion of a false claim, in whole or in part, by an agent, or in connivance with the real owner, is a substantive cause of condemnation.

Id. (Ib.) 209

12. A foreign consul has a right to claim or libel, in rem, where the rights of property of his fellow subjects are in question, without any special authority from those for whose benefit he acts.

The Bello Corruces, (152, 168) 229, 233

13. But a consul cannot receive actual restitution of the res in controversy, without a special authority from the particular individuals who are entitled.

Id. (169) 233

14. A citizen of the United States cannot claim in their courts, the property of foreign nations in amity with the United States, captured by him in war, wheresoever the capturing vessel may have been equipped, or by whomsoever commissioned.

Id. (Ib.) 233

15. In case of an illegal capture, in violation of the neutrality of this country, the property of the lawful owners cannot be forfeited for a breach of its revenue laws, by the captors, or persons who have rescued the property from their possession.

Id. (Ib.) 233

16. Whatever difficulty there may be under our municipal institutions, in punishing, as pirates, citizens of the United States who take from a state at war with Spain, a commission to cruise against that power, contrary to the 14th article of the Spanish treaty, yet there is no doubt that such acts are to be considered as piratical acts for all civil purposes, and the offending parties cannot appear, and claim in our courts the property thus taken.

Id. (Ib.) 233

17. It seems, that the terms, "a state with which the said King shall be at war," in the 14th article of the treaty, include the South American provinces which have revolted against Spain.

Id. (Ib.) 233

18. But, however this may be, the neutrality act of June, 1797, c. 1. extends the same prohibition, with all its consequences, to a colony revolting, and making war against its parent country.

Id. (Ib.) 233

19. In the case of such an illegal capture, the property of the lawful owners cannot be forfeited for a violation of the revenue laws of this country, by the captors, or by persons who have rescued the property from their possession.

Id. (Ib.) 233

20. The rights of salvage may be forfeited by spoliation, smuggling, or other gross misconduct of the salvors.

Id. (Ib.) 233

21. Where a capture is made of the property of the subjects of a nation in amity with the United States, by a vessel built, armed, equipped, and owned in the United States, such capture is illegal, and the property, if brought within our territorial limits, will be restored to the original owners.

La Concepcion, (235, 238) 249, 250

22. Where a transfer of the capturing vessel in the ports of the belligerent state, under whose flag and commission she sails on a cruise, is set up in order to legalize the capture, the bona fides of the sale must be proved by the usual documentary evidence, in a satisfactory manner.

Id. (Ib.) 250

23. This court does not recognize the existence of any lawful court of prize at Galvestown, nor of any Mexican republic or state, with power to authorize captures in war.

The Nueva Anna and Liebre, (193) 239

24. Citation from De Steck as to the powers of consuls.

Note to the Bello Corruces, Note 2, (156) 230

25. Opinion of M. Portalis on the right of consuls to claim in a court of prize.

Note to the Bello Corruces, Appendix, Note V. (59) 362

26. Articles of the Spanish treaty of 1795, referred to in the case of The Amiable Isabella, Appendix, Note I. (3) 343

27. Decisions of the French Council of Prizes respecting the form and effect of passports to neutral vessels.

The case of The Amiable Isabella.

Appendix, Note II.

(12) 346

28. Articles of the French, Dutch, Swedish, and Prussian treaties, referred to in The Amiable Isabella, Appendix, Note III. (23) 350

29. Convention of 1801 between Russia and Great Britain, referred to in the above case.

Appendix, Note IV.

(52) 360

PRIZE—7.

1. The commission conclusive proof of the national character of a public ship.

The Santissima Trinidad, (284, 335) 454, 467

2. During the existence of the civil war between Spain and her colonies, and previous to the acknowledgment of the independence of the latter by the United States, the colonies were deemed by us belligerent nations, and entitled to all the sovereign rights of war against their enemy.

Id. (337) 467

3. Our municipal laws do not prohibit the trade in contraband articles. It is merely subject, by the laws of nations, to the penalty of confiscation, in case of capture.

Id. (340) 468

4. In cases of capture, supposed to be in violation of our neutrality, where the enlistment of men within our territory is proved, the onus probandi is thrown on the claimant to prove that such enlistment was lawful as being of the subjects of the state under whose flag the capture was made.

Id. (342) 469

5. The sixth article of the Spanish treaty of 1795 only provides for the restitution of Spanish ships captured within our jurisdiction.

Id. (346) 470

6. Quere, As to the right of expatriation?

Id. (347) 470

7. Supposing such a right to exist, it cannot be exercised without a bona fide change of domicile, and can never be asserted as a cover for fraud, or to justify a crime against the country, or any violation of its laws.

Id. (348) 470

8. An augmentation of force or illegal outfit within the neutral territory only affects captures made during the cruise for which such augmentation or outfit was made.

Id. (Ib.) 470

9. Captures by public ships, as well as by privateers, if made in violation of our neutrality, are subject to restitution.

Id. (350) 471

10. Case of The Exchange, 7 Cranch, 116, distinguished from this case.

Id. (352) 471

11. Quere, How far a condemnation as prize in the court of the captor's country will oust the jurisdiction of the neutral tribunal, proceeding in rem against the captured property for a violation of the neutral jurisdiction.

Id. (355) 472

12. Such a condemnation will not oust the jurisdiction of the neutral tribunal, which has custody of the res capta, before its condemnation in the court of the captor.

Id. (Ib.) 472

13. Prizes made by armed vessels which have violated the statutes for preserving the neutrality of the United States, will be restored if brought into our ports.

The Gran Para, (471, 486) 502, 504

14. But this court has never decided that the offense adheres to the vessel under whatever change of circumstances that may take place, nor that it cannot be deposited at the termination of the cruise, in preparing for which it was committed; but if this termination be merely colorable, and the vessel was originally equipped with the intention of being employed on the cruise during which the capture was made, the delictum is not purged.

Id. (487) 504

15. A question of fact respecting the proprietary interest in prize goods, captured by an armed vessel fitted out in violation of the statutes of neutrality of the United States. Restitution to the original Spanish owners decreed.

16. This court will restore to the former owners property captured in violation of the neutrality of the United States, where it is claimed by the original wrong-doer, though it may have come back to his possession after a regular condemnation as prize.

The Arrogante Barcelones, (496, 518) 507, 512

17. Quære, How far a condemnation would protect the title of a third person, being a bona fide purchaser, without notice, in such a case.

Id. (519) 512

18. In cases where a condemnation is relied on, the libel as well as the sentence must be produced.

The Nereyda, Note 2. (Ib.) 512

19. In such cases, the claimant must show by competent evidence that he was a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration.

Id. (Ib.) 512

20. A question of fact upon the bona fides of an alleged salo of Portuguese ships, and their cargoes, which had been captured in violation of our neutrality. Restitution to the original owners decreed.

The Monte Allegre, (520) 513

PRIZE—8.

1. Quære, Whether a regular sentence of condemnation in a court of the captor, or his ally, the captured property having been carried infra præsidia, will preclude the courts of this country from restoring it to the original owners, where the capture was made in violation of our laws, treaties, and neutral obligations.

La Nereyda, (108, 174) 574, 589

2. Whoever claims under such a condemnation, must show that he is a bonæ fidei purchaser, for a valuable consideration, unaffected with any participation in the violation of our neutrality by the captors.

Id. (167) 588

3. Whoever sets up a title, under a condemnation, as prize, is bound to produce the libel, or other equivalent proceeding, under which the condemnation was pronounced, as well as the sentence of condemnation itself.

Id. (168) 588

4. Quære, Whether a condemnation in a court of an ally, of property carried into his ports by a co-belligerent, is valid.

Id. (109) 574

5. Where an order for further proof is made, and the party disobeys, or neglects to comply with its injunctions, courts of prize generally consider such disobedience, or neglect, as fatal to his claim.

Id. (171) 589

6. Upon such an order, it is almost the invariable practice for the claimant (besides other testimony) to make proof by his own oath of his proprietary interest, and to explain the other circumstances of the transaction; and the absence of such proof and explanation always leads to considerable doubts.

Id. (Ib.) 589

7. In cases of collusive capture, papers found on board one captured vessel may be invoked into the case of another, captured on the same cruise.

The Experiment, (261) 612

8. A commission obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations will not vest the interests of prize.

Id. (264) 613

9. But a collusive capture, made under a commission, is not, per se, evidence that the commission was fraudulently obtained.

Id. (Ib.) 613

10. A collusive capture vests no title in the captors, not because the commission is thereby made void, but because the captors thereby forfeit all title to the prize property.

Id. (Ib.) 613

11. Collusive captures and violations of the revenue laws, committed by a private armed vessel, are a breach of the condition of the bond given by the owners, under the prize act of June 26, 1812, c. 430, s. 3. If such breach appear upon demurrer, the defendants are not entitled to a hearing in equity, under the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, sec. 26.

Greeley v. United States, (256) 611

SALE—6.

1. In an action at law by the vendee, against the vendor, for a breach of the contract, in not delivering the thing sold, the proper measure of damages is not the price stipulated in the contract, but the value at the time of the breach.

Hopkins v. Lee, (109, 118) 218, 221

2. This rule applies to the sale of real as well as personal property: but, Quære, Whether it is the proper measure of damages in the case of an action for eviction.

SHIPPING—8.

By a charter-party, the sum of $30,000 was agreed to be paid for the use or hire of the ship, on a voyage from Philadelphia to Madeira, and thence to Bombay, and, at the option of the charterer, to Calcutta, and back to Philadelphia (with an addition of $2,000 if she should proceed to Calcutta), the whole payable on the return of the ship to Philadelphia, and before the discharge of her cargo there, in approved notes, not exceeding an average time of ninety days from the time at which she should be ready to discharge her cargo. The charterer proceeded in the ship to Calcutta, and, with the consent of the master (who was appointed by the ship-owners), entered into an agreement with P. & Co., merchants there, that if they would make him an advance of money he would deliver to them a bill of lading, stipulating for the delivery of the goods purchased therewith, to their agents in Philadelphia, free of freight, who should be authorized to sell the same, and apply the proceeds to the repayment of the said advance, unless the charterer's bills, drawn on G. & S., of Philadelphia, should be accepted; in which event the agents of P. & Co. should deliver the goods to the charterer. The goods were shipped accordingly, and a bill of lading signed by the master, with the clause, "freight for the said goods having been settled here." The bills of exchange, drawn by the charterer, were refused acceptance, and the agents of P. & Co. demanded the goods, which the owners of the ship refused to deliver, without the payment of freight. Held, that the owners of the ship had a lien on these goods for the freight.
